The Return of the Disc Junkie's better half

By JON DRUKMAN
Collegian Correspondent

DISC JUNKIE

The phrase "sex, drugs and rock and roll," seems singularly inappropriate to me for the catchphrase of a generation. Truth be told, they're really all the same thing: a habit. Yes, I am aware that there are the odd souls (Stephen Patrick Morrissey springs to mind) who are sexless, and probably not everyone does drugs, and possibly there are those sick minds that don't appreciate rock and roll. The point, however, is that people can and do get addicted to all three. My personal indulgence is currently music. The weirder the better. The more densely layered the better. I not only want frosting on my cake, but I want jimmies, sprinkles, writing, candles and those funny little silver beads, too. Welcome, then, to the den of the Disc Junkie. Let's just take a look at what summer '89 had to offer us.

Sometime in early July, an album that I had been anticipating for months surfaced in America. It is the first full-length effort by a British outfit called Meat Beat Manifesto, and it is called Storm the Studio. "Dense" does not begin to describe this album. It is not closely layered like an onion, it is closely layered like an onion wrapped in a swiss clockwork and put inside a set of Russian dolls. The four side-length pieces are subdivided into three or four sections, each exploring a different facet of the main theme of that side. The four side length pieces are subdivided into 3 or 4 sections each exploring a different facet of the main theme of that side. For example, the four sections of "God O.D." present the song as, variously, a hip-hop rap clatter and a funk dance outing, featuring the vocals reprised as a rasping whisper, with an evangelical story thrown in for good measure, an indian snake charmer dance, and finally a piece of pure noise, throbbing layers of screaming metal on metal. The album flirts dangerously with sensory overload, incorporating so many things happening at once that your head simply threatens to burst rather than follow all the threads. The beat pounds over everything, with dozens of percussive noises all beating in the bizarre dance. This is one of the most accomplished productions I have seen lately. Ignore it at your own peril.

This summer also saw the release of the eagerly awaited third album from British band The The. The fact that it has been three years in the making, combined with the fact that ex-Smiths guitarist Johnny Marr is now in the band, pushed expectations high for this one. Entitled Mind Bomb, it is unfortunately a bit of a dud. The fury and anger on the previous album Infected has been subdued, and while lead singer/songwriter Matt Johnson still has a chip on his shoulder, he has turned his wrath to a much larger scale and wound up having it diffused.

"Armageddon Days Are Here (Again)" is a pointed attack on religion, but it never really gels, and the simplistic, repetitive chorus doesn't do anything for it. "The Violence of Truth" is better, with Marr's wah-wah guitar giving the extra edge to it. Sadly, the thing that ultimately kills this album is the fact that the songs just aren't as good as the ones on previous albums. The duet with Sinead O'Connor called "Kingdom of Rain" is bound for college radio success, but it's really just a hollow echo of an Infected track called "Slow Train to Dawn". "Slow Train" was a generally stronger song, and it happened to be a duet with the then-unknown Neneh Cherry, many years away from the success of "Buffalo Stance" and "Kisses on the Wind". The tight punch of the four minute pop song has been replaed by the bombast of the seven minute "composition". In short, Mind Bomb is a fizzle.

The latest album from Pop Will Eat Itself was already covered in this august journal, but I feel the reviewer missed the point of the album completely. I liked this album immensely, and would probably put it down as one of my three favourite summer albums. I would urge listeners to test drive the record themseves before consigning it to either a permanent place in their collections or the dustbin.

This fall promises to be spectacular—expect new releases from Kate Bush, Public Enemy, and Severed Heads before Thanksgiving! In the meantime, stick with the Junkie for details and derangements.

New Horizon
The Hatch
Wednesday, Sept. 20

By JOHN HESS
Collegian Correspondent

Those of us who chose to ignore our evening studies in favor of a few beers at the Hatch were richly and deservedly rewarded Wednesday night. The quartet New Horizon is a local reggae band notable to the UMass music scene for their frequent appearances at Twister's, though the members are all authentically Carribean in origin.

REVIEW

New Horizon's message is ostensibly peace and love, but their product is pure energy and fun. They have a very affable stage presence, and a fair amount of talent.

The drummer, Alwynne Mentos, has played behind Joan Baez and Jimmy Buffet, and the bass guitarist, who answers to the unusually sensible pseudonym Bassie, has, in the past, worked with the Mighty Sparrow. Rhythm guitarist Wayne Clendiman combined with the two to create an excellent rhythmic foundation for the music. Addis Smith added the melodies by virtue of his mellifluous vocals and keyboard work.

The result of all this, were songs that were both technically satisfying and compellingly danceable. New Horizon puts on a good show under almost any circumstances, but on this night, the band certainly benefited from the presence of a very special guest, guitarist Chris Newlan.

Newlan, a native of Weston, Massachusetts, is the driving force behind the soca group Arrow, a hot band just coming off a European tour. In his free time, Newlan sits in with New Horizon, and his musical presence was greatly welcomed. Most of the songs were liberally spiced with Newlan's handiwork—blistering solos and clean, rhythmic chords.

The songs themselves were mostly covers of reggae mainstays like UB40 and Bob Marley, and a bit more original material would have been welcomed. Drummer Mentos claims that the band has written over fifty songs, but only a few of those were actually performed. Fortunately however, it made little difference. The songs were tastefully selected and interpreted well, to the band's particular style. A Carribean version of the Ben E. King classic "Stand By Me" was a noteworthy crowd favorite.

Despite a noticeable loss of momentum in the show's second half, anyone with an interest in reggae would be well advised to give New Horizon a look. The Hatch was full, and everyone seemed to enjoy themselves thoroughly.

If you missed New Horizon this time around, you'll have plenty more opportunities to see them jam, be it at Twister's or the Hatch.

Wham, Bam, Rock 'n' Roll

By JAMIE FENNESSY
Collegian Correspondent

Do you want high-energy theatrics? Is hard-driving rock 'n' roll what you are looking for? Then get down to the Hatch tonight because Jester, the band that just last semester was getting kicked out of dorm lounges for practicing too loud, is once again performing its very own style of show.

PREVIEW

The band returns to the sight of its first gig ever, after a summer of songwriting, tightening their sound, and heavy touring. The tour included parties, clubs, and a trip to the Summit Hill Club of Peabody, where the band reached the semi-finals of a battle of the bands competition. They were regulars on the North Shore.

Although they've only been around for 4 months, Jester is already on a roll with such original songs as "Caroline", "Victim of Confusion," and "Down and Out." They have enough original material to put on a show of two 45-minute sets. The band also has enough classic cover tunes to keep everyone happy, though they would much rather stick to their own songs.

This Newton-based quartet consists of Mike Avarich on lead guitar, Sir Michaels on bass, Ed Sergeant with lead vocals, and David Paul DinNino on drums. The four collaborate equally on songwriti?s write the music, then DiNino lays down a blistering rhythm track, and Sergeant kicks in with the lyrics. Any trip past the green house, their new practicing quarters, and the band can be heard pounding away.

But don't get Jester confused with any "play as loud as you can" rock band. These musicians have a message. As Micheals said, "Jester is not just a band, it's a concept. We're not just straight ahead rock and roll, all our lyrics have meaning. We're very serious about our music."

"We're wham-bam rock and roll," added DeNino. "We are theatrical, but we have the rock core to back it up."

Jester has gone through many stages of development and now feel confident that they can make it big. They treat tonight's show as a stepping stone to bigger and better opportunities. The band packed the Hatch last year and is hoping for another sellout tonight. But they're not taking any chances. They're giving away demo tapes and posters to the first 25 people who show up. "We want to have a cult following, but right now we'll take it any way we can."

A garden of music grows

By AL KAUFMAN
Collegian Staff

Give the people at Amherst College credit. They know what's hot. That's why this year's Sundays at Eight series, featuring some of the most talented names in the local and national folk/acoustic scene, promises to be the sleeper series of the fall.

"The series has been around for two years," said Lisa Smith, assistant director of the Amherst College Campus Center, "We've become more established so we can draw bigger names, and this year we're also more focused. We know what we're looking for."

The series has already gotten off to a wonderful start with Cheryl Wheeler and Devonsquare, and this week promises to be just as enjoyable when Maine singer/songwriter/guitarist David Mallett honors us with his exquisite melodies.

Mallett was discovered by Noel Paul Stookey of Peter, Paul and Mary. Stookey produced Mallett's first three albums, which came out on on Stookedy's record company, Neworld. Mallett has since signed with Flying Fish and has released two albums under that label.

Mallett is a superb songwriter whose melodies and lyrics are deceptively simple. His rich, majestic voice delivers his picturesque words with the ease falling rain.

In concert, Mallett is unlike Cheryl Wheeler and Devonsquare in that he does not talk to the audience often. Instead, he lets his songs and guitar speak for themselves. Mallett is an accomplished six-string, twelve-string and classical guitarist, and his melodies compliment his personal and occasionally haunting songs beautifully.

Mallett is best known for "Garden Song" ("Inch by inch, row by row/Gonna make this garden grow."), which has been covered by John Denver and Pete Seeger. Other gems include "The Last Time I Saw Annie," about a former girlfriend, and "Fire," a very moving, personal song about when his barn and house burned down during his boyhood years.

The warm, intimate confines of the Amherst College Campus Center Frontroom, complete with plush chairs encompassing many small, round tables, provides the perfect, coffeehouse-like atmosphere for such a performer, and for such as series that includes David Bromberg in the following weeks.

The Vestrymen- a local band who believe the love-in is about to make a comeback, and want Gene Pitney to join their band, will be opening for Robyn Hitchcock at the Bluewall on Saturday night. he concert is a UPC production.

Ray Mason does it with rhythm

By PAUL D'AGOSTINO
Collegian Correspondent

Performing at Sheehan's Cafe on Saturday Sept. 30th will be the Ray Mason Band. The local four-piece group includes Ray Mason on vocals and guitar, Matt Cullen on guitar, Jerry Ellis on bass and Keith Levereault on drums.

The band formed about four-and-a-half years ago. "It was natural for us to get togther," says Mason. Since they have known each other for years and played together in other bands. In their year and a half of playing some of their concert places have included T.T. the Bears in Cambridge, the Rat in Boston, and CBGB's in New York.

Mason says his personal influences have been 60's style music such as the Beatles and R&B. He has also played solo at the Iron Horse in Northampton. Matt Cullen has been in local band Square 1, Jerry Ellis has played with the Elevators, and Keith Leveault was with In the Flesh, at one time.

The band, whose R&B and country infected music equals "great original rock" have also played extensively around the local area, mostly in Northampton, and are staples of the local music scene. They're good and sweaty and bluesy and real. The Ray Mason Band is also one of the most beloved local bands, simply because they deliver what most audiences want: a good time.

The band also has a new cassette out. It is self-titled and available at Main Street Records in Northampton and is worth it's financial cost alone by the richness of the song She's wearing her hair like Donna Reed.

Danielle will open the show this Saturday night, on cello.

P.I.L. tix on sale Monday

UPC has announced that tickets for the PIL/Flesh For Lulu show in the Fine Arts Center on Oct. 14th will go on sale Monday morning.

The PIL show in Springfield's Paramount Theater has been cancelled, making the UMass show the only PIL show in western Massachusetts.

Led by the incomparable John Lydon, PIL is currently touring to promote their latest album, 9, which has yielded them the club hits "Happy?" and "Disappointed."

Opening the show will be Flesh For Lulu, whose new album, Plastic Fantastic, will be in stores shortly.

The new sound in music:

BIGOTRY

Music Industry:

Listen to the new sound. Hear who the music world is putting down. It's called bigotry and it goes something like this. "Niggers... get outta my way/Don't need to buy none/ Of your gold chains today" and "Jews are wicked... (responsible for) a majority of wickedness that goes on across the globe."

The first quote is lyrics. Frightening enough in itself, but the fact that it comes from a Guns and Roses album that sold 9 million copies, is worse.

The second quote was actually given in an interview in the Washington Times by "Professor Griff" from the popular rap group Public Enemy.

Have we, as a nation, grown apathetic about the racial, religious and sexual bias that is beginning to permeate our society?

What happened to the good old days when the music industry was THE voice of positive social change?

When Dylan sang "The Times, They Are 'A Changing", he meant for the better, and the music industry was behind that. Music like "Give Peace A Chance" spread love, instead of hate.

The music industry is powerful. It can, and has, made a difference. Isn't it about time that it takes a firm stand against the immoral spread of hatred and bigotry? If we all work together, "We Shall Overcome" once again.

New book looks at advertising

By DAVID R. MARK
Collegian Staff

Author Wilson Bryan Key says he doesn't have a dirty mind. He says he's not imagining things.

There really is a penis in that ice cube, he says.

He says that's because the ice cube is a drawing, and the image, and perhaps a Christ figure, some floating monsters and a nude woman, have been drawn into the cube to stimulate your subconscious — with the hope that you'll remember the name of the drink poured over the cube.

It's called subliminal advertising. But the American Association of Advertising Agencies and others in the advertising industry say it doesn't exist, and that Key is letting his imagination get the better of him and anyone who listens to him.

"It's like the tooth fairy or UFO sightings," said John O'Toole, president of the AAAA, New York, which has more than 500 member advertising agencies. "It's hogwash."

"Just when people stop talking about subliminal advertising, a new book by Key comes out," O'Toole said. With the publication of The Age of Manipulation, (Henry Holt & Co., 1989, $24.95) O'Toole said he loathes having to convince people again that subliminal advertising doesn't exist.

"You would think if this practice were as prevalent as [Key] says it is, I would have heard about it," O'Toole said. "But in 35 years, I've never seen a subliminal message, and I have no examples of it that I can give you."

Key maintains that what you get is more than what you see. What he sees is altered or air-brushed shadows and several other tricks that leave the consumer with hundreds of subliminal messages.

"Advertising research suggests 1,100 sales messages are [encountered] daily, but few at the cognitive level," Key said. "But even though you're exposed to that many messages, most people can't remember five they saw yesterday."

He said if that is true, advertising would be an incredible waste of money.

"But it instead works enormously well," Key said. "There must be someway it works."

"These subliminals are used in advertising, to reinforce the conscious or cognitive message," he said, adding the subliminals stimulate the subconscious, which leads to retention.

Not so, according to Charles F. Adams, former director of the Washington office of the AAAA. Adams, giving testimony to the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms in 1981, said subliminal advertising would be laughable if not for Key, who Adams said was responsible for "most of the existing fear."

Adams said attempts to use subliminal advertising, few as there have been, have failed.

The first and most famous attempt was made by James Vicary in 1957. Vicary used a tachistoscope, an extremely fast shutter device, to flash the messages "eat popcorn" and "drink Coca-Cola" across a movie screen. The messages flashed by in 1/3000th of a second.

According to Vicary, the subliminal message increased popcorn sales by 57 percent and Coca-Cola sales by 18 percent.

Later tests to prove the power of the tachistoscope failed, Adams said, with Vicary later admitting the success of the machine was exaggerated.

Subliminal advertising is illegal. The Federal Trade Commission, the Federal Communications Commission and the National Association of Broadcaster prohibit its use. Key said the reason it continues is that "it's a subject that scares the devil out of people."

He said the government finds what it wants to find, and government doesn't want to look for current examples of subliminal advertising.

"The rulings by the FCC and the FTC may be unenforceable," Key said, adding that a politician who tries to enforce them would be labeled anti-business, soon needing "to look for a new job."

O'Toole said there would be no reason to put a male organ in an advertisement, because that would be remembered instead of the product.

"The first rule of advertising I learned is, 'Do not try to attract the attention of the consumer to anything that is irrelevant to the product,'" he said, adding an orgy or a monster is irrelevant when you want to sell soap.

Key said the subliminals don't attract the attention of the consumer. If they did, he said, they wouldn't be subliminal, or "below the threshold of consciousness."

"If you easily saw a Christ figure in that ice cube, you'd look at it and say, 'That's interesting,' and probably be turned off," he said.

"What we're talking about is perception. There is something that's put there by a highly paid artist whose job is to manipulate your perception," he said.

"At the unconscious level, no detail is too small, too insignificant, to be overlooked by the brain," Key said. "Anything of a highly taboo, sexual nature is likely to stay in a person's brain for a long, long time."

"It may not surface, but the brain can make linkages and foster behavior. Advertisers found this out and developed that theory into high technology."

Key, who has taught at universities in the United States and Canada and worked in advertising for several years, said he spoke with several artists who draw advertisements that look like photographs.

He said these artists, on the condition of anonymity, told him they embedded words such as "sex" within their drawings as well as airbrushed shadows and other small designs that would stimulate a consumer's subconscious.

A poll of art directors that appeared in a 1984 edition of Advertising Age — a poll designed to prove Key wrong — appears to support key's assessment of artists in the advertising industry. The poll found 5 percent of those questioned had either deliberately embedded a subliminal message, supervised such an embedding, or knew of such embeddings taking place.

Poor special teams play has cost the Patriots dearly

FOXBORO (AP) — Special teams may be only one-third of an NFL club, but their play has led to half the points scored by New England's opponents.

Along with offense and defense, a team's success or failure depends on its special teams, that part of the squad that handles kicking, returning kicks and defending against field goals and extra points.

In the 1985 season, when the Patriots reached the Super Bowl, their special teams were outstanding.

This year, kicking game foulups have led to 24 of the 48 points the Patriots have allowed, forcing them to struggle for a victory in their first game and playing a major role in their second-game loss.

But Mosi Tatupu, a special teams standout for most of his 12 seasons with the Patriots, says that except for some glaring mistakes, that part of the game is going well.

"We're pretty solid," he said Wednesday. "We've been playing will returning kickoffs and covering punts. We've been close to breaking kickoffs a couple of times (for long gains) and the coverage has been solid, too."

But in the patriots' 27-24 season-opening victory, the New York Jets scored one touchdown on a fake field goal when linebacker Larry McGrew left his area open and another just one play after a blocked punt that occurred when Jim Bowman missed a block on Erik McMillan.

In the Patriot's 24-10 loss last Sunday, Miami scored a touchdown after an incomplete pass by Jeff Feagls on a fake punt and a field goal after a poor snap by Danny Villa forced Feagles into a desperation throw that also fell incomplete.

On Sunday, New England must face Seattle, which was fourth in the AFC last year in average gain on kickoff returns and fifth on punt returns.

Patriots' punt returner Irving Fryar said no major changes have been made on special teams since the loss to Miami.

"I'm not concerned about it," he said. "Ask me again in six weeks."

Tatupu said the 1985 Patriots had the best special teams play since he joined the club.

"We don't have the same guys (playing special teams) we had two or three years ago," Tatupu said. "Rookies are going to be playing on a lot of special teams with veterans. You hope you can get a feel for each other."

Nor do the Patriots have the same special teams coach. Keith Rowen has succeeded Dante Scarnecchia, who left after last season to become an assistant coach with Indianapolis.

"We haven't really changed our philosophy that much," Tatupu said of the coaching change. "We've added a couple of more things to the punt game, the punt rushing game."

"The last couple of weeks we just didn't execute," he added. "If you're sound, you shouldn't make those mistakes."

Feagles couldn't explain the problems.

"Maybe younger players, a new coach. I don't know. I really don't," he said. "Luck, Bad luck."

Although fans may pay more attention to offensive and defensive units, games can hinge on the performance of special teams.

"When you're out there on special teams, you have to take it like it's your last play," Feagles said. "Special teams is one-third of the game."

Against Miami, the botched fake punt gave the Dolphins the ball at the New England 20-yard line. They scored three plays later. After the poor snap, Miami got the ball on the New England 29 and scored a field goal five plays later.

Giving an opponent good field position makes life tougher for the defense.

"It's added pressure on us, but realistically a defense has to stop the offense wherever the ball is, even if it's on the 1-yard line," cornerback Raymond Clayborn said.

Sports notices:

The field hockey game between the University of Massachusetts and Providence College was cancelled yesterday because of poor playing conditions on Totman Field caused by rain. UMass is trying to reschedule the game for today at 3:30 p.m.

The University of Massachusetts crew team will be in action Saturday when the Minutemen meet Holy Cross College at the lower Boyden fields.

UMass will race in two different divisions, the A and the B. The A race will be at 1:45 p.m. and the B race at 3 p.m.

This will be the Minutemen's second meet of the year. UMass lost to St. Andrews University of Scotland last weekend in its opening race.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

HAPPY BIRTHDAY! IN THE NEXT YEAR OF YOUR LIFE: Welcome long-sought changes. Cementing an alliance in December will help you make more money. Let go of a tiring relationship by Valentine's Day' you will enjoy being footloose and fancy-free. Work hard to get an old friendship back on track. Taking a European vacation next summer could lead to a second career. Your ability to see things objectively will serve you well when a family crisis arises next September. You pass a test with flying colors. Others see you in a new light.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Get an early start today and call someone on a distant coast. An influential person is willing to grant favors. Seize this opportunity! A patient attitude helps restore domestic harmony.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Tap your creative and artistic talents; you will make a bundle! Taking a small gamble on a stranger could lead to a wonderful new relationship. Postpone making major family decisions. Seek mates's view.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Help a young person who is struggling with a problem. A telephone call will keep the wolf away from the door. Writing letters brings big dividends. Welcome a touch of romance tonight.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Be prepared to work harder; channel your excess energy into constructive new outlets. Reassess a relationship. It might be better to cut your losses. Entertain in an unusual setting.

LEO (July 23-Aug 22): It may be necessary to say 'no' to someone who tries to involve you in a community project. Investigate a stock tip provided by a 'lucky' friend. Check how often his guesses have paid off.

VIRGO (Aug 23-Sept 22): An experiment may not produce the desired results. You can save time and money by taking a leaf from someone else's book. Be prepared for changes. If married, be more appreciative of your mate.

LIBRA (Sept 23-Oct 22): You could be caught in a power struggle that is not of your making. Someone persists in throwing his weight around. Be more assertive. A special relationship boosts your spirits later today.

SCORPIO (Oct 23-Nov 21): You feel like going on the attack but do not want innocent bystanders to get caught in the fallout. Stick to your principles, even if doing so costs you money. Romance looks rosy.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov 22-Dec 21): Successful retirement depends upon your attitude as well as your finances. Seek experts' advice about investments. Accept and issue social invitations. Romance is not over.

CAPRICORN (Dec 22-Jan 19): Emotion could be getting in the way of clear thinking. Question your instinctive reaction; you could be wrong. Stop and reconsider. A child offers surprising insights into the whole situation.

AQUARIUS (Jan 20-Feb 18): Simplify your life by getting rid of unwanted clothes and household items. Donate them to your favoritee charity for a tax deduction. A dream could prove prophetic. Get in touch with an old friend.

PISCES (Feb 19-March 20): You could be the recipient of someone's generosity this weekend. Show what a great guest you can be. Share expenses and volunteer to do some babysitting. Try to attend a community or club meeting.

"Vermont is an extremely good defensive team. They generate their attack off their defense," said Gettler. "They're a transition team. They're well-organized, well-coached."

The Catamounts boast one of New England's finest goalkeepers, senior tri-captain Jim St. Andre. St. Andre set and currently holds the career New England record for shutouts (31). As a sophomore, St. Andre was named All-American.

Senior sweeper Kevin Wylie has dominated backfield play for the three years he's played for Vermont. Last year he was named 1st Team All-New England. This tri-captain was named MVP of both the Air Force and Hartwick tournaments. He scored the tie-winning goal of the Hartwick game and has tallied two goals for the season.

Vermont's sophomore forward Jim Warwuck has three goals and one assist for seven points, leading New England as well as the team in goals scored. Senior forward Mike Mason (2,1) has been named All-New England for the past two consecutive years and is a sprinter for the track team. Junior midfielder Roberto Beall (2,2) is the third tri-captain.

"They've shown they can defend. We've shown we can defend," Gettler said. "I doubt it will be a high-scoring game."

This Saturday UMass seniors Steve Cesneck and Evan Buxner will be taking their LSATs (a four hour exam) and then coming onto the field. "That could be our only question mark, as to whether they'll come out mentally prepared to play," said Gettler. "but that's what this is all about — an education."

Freshman Steve Armenti, who played an oustanding game against Dartmouth, will be starting in the goal. Again, Sophomore midfielder Tom Novajasky will be starting in the place of junior Peter McEvoy.

"Our attack hasn't matured yet this season. The midfield hasn't held the ball," said Gettler. "The forwards have ended up with the ball at midfield instead of down near the goal but because Vermont is a defensive team, we should be able to feed to the forwards downfield.

"Vermont is a tough team to beat," Gettler said of the game to be played at 1 p.m. Saturday on Boyden Hill. "The question for this game is who's going to generate the best chances."

UMass hosts Springfield

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Correspondent

For many people, history and math are an unorthodox combination. The two might just mix, however, for the University of Massachusetts women's cross country team as they prepare to face Springfield College Saturday in the Minutewomen's only home meet of the year.

Consider the history: last year UMass took the second through sixth spots in its meet against Springfield. Remove the variable of Martha Grinnell, Springfield's number-one runner who graduated last year, from the equation and you have a good looking formula for success.

UMass coach Julie LaFreniere's team will be buoyed by the return of freshman Becky Johnson, who sat out last Thursday's meet against Yale and Boston College with a sprained ankle. LaFreniere is optimistic about Johnson's return, stating "Basically she's just had a week off. She's trained hard all summer and a week won't destroy all she's worked for. She's really psyched for her first collegiate meet."

Although the team's record is 0-1-1, the Minutewomen tied B.C., a team they had suffered eight straight losses to, without Johnson. Junior Laura Lavallee, who ran to a strong tenth place finish against Yale and B.C. last week has high hopes for the team's prospects.

"The team as a whole will be in a better position for this meet," Lavallee said. "If we run well as a team, we can compete with the best of them,"

"The team's running great," LaFreniere said. "They're running in a tight pack, and the return of Becky is only going to tighten them up even more."

Perhaps most encouraging, is that of the top eight UMass runners against B.C., all but one were underclassmen. Even captain Shana Smith, the only senior on the team, has another year of eligibility left.

Saturday's meet provides some strategic options for the team, according to LaFreniere. "I want them to go out hard in the first couple of miles," LaFreniere said. "Our course is similar to the course for the New England Championships, with a lot of uphills the first two miles."

Looking at the opponent, Springfield, shows only positive signs for UMass. Speaking about Springfield and Grinnell, LaFreniere said: "There's no way you can replace a runner like that. We dominated them last year, and we're a better team this year."

Tennis travels to UNH

By C.J. ABATI
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's tennis team has yet to serve competitively this season, but it has already been struck with disappointment and frustration. Their first two matches, Rhode Island and Providence, have been rained out. They travel to the University of New Hampshire today to, weather permitting, open their season.

New Hampshire plays a similar schedule to UMass, and is led by coach Russ McCurrty, "UNH is traditionally a stronger state university," stated UMass coach Edwin Gentzler. "In the years that I've been here at UMass, we've never beaten them. We've beaten other New England schools, Rhode Island ... Vermont, but never New Hampshire."

Last years match ended in a 5-3 score with one match suspended due to darkness.

This year's match should be just as close, and perhaps very difficult for either team to prove who is stronger. "UNH is a fine state university. Their student body is a lot like our own. This closeness should make things more competitive.

"The match will be very close,"stated Gentzler. "It probably will come down to a third set tie break, and one team winning 5-4 either way. Hopefully it will be us."

The rain outs of the past week could still come back to haunt the Minutewomen. "The rain outs will definitely be a problem," commented Gentzler. "They've played two matches already."

"New Hampshire is match ready and waiting to pounce on another opponent. We haven't gotten over our first match gitters yet," mentioned Gentzler.

"I've coached in these situations before. I expect my girls to overcome the problem, and play their best tennis," stated Gentzler. "I know they can do it."

"Everybody has been playing well in practice, and pushing for the top spot. Everyone's been challenged,"stated Gentzler. "It will be a good match."

Another is defensive tackle Justin Strzelczyk, a 6-foot-5, 275-pounder who has literally grown into one of the dominating defensive players in the Yan Con.

"When we recruited him he was a 6-4, 205-pound safety and tight end," Reid said. "Now we're upset we missed him. He must have been doing a lot of work with 'weights.'"

Other players to watch for the Black Bears include receivers Jeff Knox and Steve Roth, tight end Matt Swinson, guard Rob Noble and safety Claude Pettaway.

The Black Bears have left an impression on everyone they've played this year, particularly Villanova, which went home spinning after a 47-14 pasting last week.

"They were still passing in the fourth quarter, and they'll hammer us if they can," Reid said of Maine's strategy. "What we need to do is focus on Smith the best we can. Last year he broke three big runs on us. He danced through our whole defense."

As far as stopping Buck, UMass will have to tighten up the underneath coverage that was a sore spot in last week's 42-23 win at Lehigh. The Minutemen showed signs of improvement in the second half and hope to carry that over to tomorrow.

"There are two things you can do with underneath coverage," Reid said. "You can blitz and the underneath receivers have to block, but then you expose the deep men. Or you can drop eight and rush three. The best thing to do this year is to mix."

But whether it helps or not is hard to say. Last year the defense was secondary as the offenses did the work in a 45-42 UMass season-opening win.

"Last year it was like we weren't on the field," Reid said. "We got a touchdown on a punt return [by Jerome Bledsoe] and on an interception return [by Vaughn Williams]. We've got to try and control on offense, and keep theirs on the bench."

Which means a good mix on offense as well. UMass has the balance with the recent play of senior quarterback Roger Baldacci and junior tailback Jerome Bledsoe.

It's such a simple strategy. The opponent can't score (well, not very often, at least) without the ball. First-year Maine coach Tom Lichtenberg feels the same about his team.

"We know that UMass will be the toughest test we've faced yet. The key for us will be to keep the ball away from UMass' offense because they can put points up there," Lichtenberg said.

Both teams can control the play. The consensus is that whoever scores most will win (now that makes sense, doesn't it?). As if they need any incentive, Maine still remembers the tough loss here last season.

"They all remember last year. It won't be hard for our guys to get up for UMass," Lichtenberg said.

Squib kicks: It's homecoming for Reid (Maine, '73), defensive coordinator Mike Hodges ('66) and offensive coordinator Bob MacConnell ('73). But it won't bear any special meaning for Reid.

"I've been up there so many times now," Reid said of returning to Orono. "You see all your friends, except now they all want to smash your face in" . . . Maine is a 7 1/2-point favorite . . . fullback David Mitchell (thigh bruise) and defensive tackle Steve Brothers (shoulder) won't start . . . Bledsoe's 209-yard effort against Lehigh was the most of any I-AA rusher this season.

He is second in the conference and fifth in the nation in rushing (127.5 per game), tied for ninth in scoring (9.0 points per game) and 17th in all-purpose rushing (142.0). Baldacci, after correcting his passing stats from Lehigh, is second in the YC and seventh in the nation in passing efficiency (161.1) and 14th in total offense (246.5 yards per game).

Other leaders include split end Chip Mitchell in scoring (second in YC, tied for ninth in country — 9.0), cornerback Garrick Amos in interceptions (second in YC, tied for third in nation — 1.0), Marco Gabrielli in punting (fifth in YC — 39.0) and linebacker Chris Tenkin in tackles (fifth in YC — 11.0).

O'Brien, however, sees much improvement in his teams workouts since last weeks disturbing loss.

"Everyone is ready to go," said O'Brien. "I've sensed a great amount of improvement from last weeks meet. The size and quality of this meet and the fact that we have had a great week of workouts should make for a pretty exciting Saturday."

After recovering from a bout with a virus, Corso appears to be ready to make an impact. Although still somewhat flat from the illness, O'Brien is hoping that Corso's hard summer of training will pull him through.

At a time in the season when the Minutemen normally don't partake in an Eastern meet with such a national flavor, O'Brien sees it as nothing but a bonus to his team, particularly when it comes time for the championship meets.

"In a race with so many quality teams,"said O'Brien."we can only learn some things that we need to know now rather than later in a more important championship meet. So if we perform well we can get excited, but if not than we can work on what we need to improve on in time for conference type meets."

Not only does o'Brien see this meet as beneficial to UMass, but to all of New England as well.

"It's a real tribute to New England cross country,"said O'Brien. "if teams of this level feel the need to come to New England to get good competition as well as to prove themselves. Everyone will get something out of this Saturday."

Minutemen do not want the Buck to pass

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts football team opens defense of its Yankee Conference title tomorrow against the one team many feel will take the beanpot this year.

The Minutemen travel to Orono, ME to face the University of Maine in their conference season opener at 1 p.m. (WTTT 1430, WHAI 1240, WMUA 91.1). In a brief season that has been full of tests already, this will probably be the biggest one of the year.

"We've been humiliated the last two times we went up there," UMass coach Jim Reid said. "They're probably the team to beat in this conference."

And if you're looking for reasons, search no further than the man with the 12-gauge for an arm, senior quarterback Mike Buck. Rated first in the conference and fourth nationally in passing, Buck is simply scary. He suffered a broken nose when he was punched outside an Orono nightspot Sunday, but he is OK to play.

"When there's parity in a conference, what you look for is an impact player," Reid said. "Last year what got us to the playoffs was the play of [quarterback] Dave Palazzi."

Reid feels that Buck is that type of player, one who has carried the Black Bears (3-0) to be rated the ninth-ranked team in the country in Division I-AA.

"He's probably one of the premier quarterbacks in the nation, I-A or I-AA," Reid said.

But if UMass looks solely toward stopping Buck tomorrow, it's going to be a long trip back to Amherst. Last year a tailback named Carl Smith proved what a dangerous balance Maine has, and he will be a player to stop again tomorrow.

UMass outshoots No. 9 Hartford, 25-6

By RICK SETO
Collegian Staff

HARTFORD — Throughout the year, the women's soccer team has had to play in all sorts of weather — first it was the blistering heat against Virginia and Colgate, then it was moderate temps versus Vermont, and for the last three games, under pouring rain.

For now, the Reds have had fair success in whatever the conditions may be, as they outshot the University of Hartford 25-6 on their way to a convincingly win on the road, 4-1, under a consistent rain.

Both teams are own 4-2 records, but more importantly, UMass defeated a team that was ahead of them in the national and regional poll.

What became the determining factor in this match was not only familiarity of playing on a wet surface but also what coach Jim Rudy likes to call 'fighting power.'

"We showed a lot today," said Rudy. "We're turning into a blue-collar team . . . a blood and guts team."

The Reds' experience over the weekend at Cornell served them well, as it was quite obvious that UMass was quicker and sharper than the Lady Hawks. Not coincidentally, the game was the first for Hartford in that type of weather.

Like the chamelion, UMass adopted its style of play to its enviornment. Defenders Sarah Szetela, Holly Hellmuth, and Margie Jaede used the slide tackle in the mud as an effective technique to strip the Lady Hawks of the ball.

Up front, juniors Sue Gaudette and April Kater were masterful on the slippery surface, with the former racking up a big goal and an assist and the latter picking up two assists.

Early in the match, the Reds took the initiative, sending attackers forward to keep the pressure on Hartford goalie Karen Romero. The freshman sported some impressive numbers coming into the game, but she cracked eleven minutes into the first half.

UMass converted on their first corner kick, as Colette Bowler's boot found its way off of Hellmuth's head and into the right corner of the net.

Midfield through the period, Hartford mounted their best attack of the day, holding the ball for three minutes. But deep back Kim Montgomery was able to protect her keeper, Mary Curtis, as she was like the broom that swept all the shots away from the goal. Curtis was solid in her fourth start, and her long punts was a key to the attack.

She was nicked only for one goal. Hartford was also able to do well on their corner kick, as Suzanne Laackman kicked in a stray ball off a Donna Harnisch header with 11:47 left in the half.

In the second half, the Lady Hawks might have been trying to prey on the Reds, but their talons got stuck in the quagmire and instead it was UMass that ate Hartford up, with two scores within a minute of each other and then a goal that sealed the victory.

Gaudette was the catalyst on offense, as her hustle and speed set up the back-to-back goals. First, she ran down a ball on the end line and crossed it back to the middle. It deflected off Kater, but Robin Runstein was there to finish the goal.

A minute later, Gaudette did it herself, blowing away three defenders on the left flank, with a burst of speed and then a cut to the middle that set up a one-on-one with Romero. Gaudette did not lose, and that was the nail in the coffin.

Later, April Kater, Leanne Swartz, and Michele Woodside combined to score off a 3-on-3 counterattack. Kater started with the ball in the middle, and flicking to Swartz on the right. She cut toward the middle again and led Woodside down the left side.

Woodside was with the ball, as she curled around a defender and set up a point-blank shot that Romero had no chance against.

Early test slated for UMass harriers

By JONATHAN REIDEL
Collegian Staff

Ready or not the University of Massachusetts men's cross country team will have to take a big early semester exam this Saturday at Dartmouth College when it goes up against a field of nine solid teams, six of which have qualified for the NCAA championships in at least one of the last two years.

At the head of this impressive field is Georgetown, featuring one of the nations finest runners in John Trautmen, Atlantic Coast Conference power Wake Forest, and host as well as the fifth place finisher at the nationals last year, Dartmouth.

With those three teams having almost certain locks on the top spots it should come down to a battle between Brown, William and Mary, Houston, and UMass for fourth, fifth, and sixth.

"I certainly hope we can beat Fairleigh Dickinson and Iona," said coach Ken O'Brien. "If Northeastern is in the same form that they have been in the past few weeks we should have a good shot at them. With a good effort we could finish fifth. I would consider that icing on the cake."

In order to recieve the icing the Minutemen will have to get top performances from harriers Art Smith, Joe Livorsi, James Chute, Herb Heffner, Matt Simon and Mike Davis. Only a few quality performances, such as in last week's loss to Boston College and Yale, won't be near enough for the Minutemen if they intend to make any kind of assault on the middle group of teams.

Minutemen to host the Catamounts

The University of Massachusetts men's soccer team hosts Vermont tomorrow.

By ADRIENNE MATT
Collegian Staff

Facing a team that is currently ranked first in New England and 12th in the nation, even at home, is not an easy task. However, head coach Jeff Gettler of the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team doesn't feel the pressure of the University of Vermont's status.

"I think the pressure is on them," said Gettler of Saturday's opponents. "They're going to come in tight because we're 0-3-1 and we have the potential to upset, to do damage to their rep.

"Their current rank is all the more incentive for us. We're facing numbers 1, 4 and 5 in New England in a short period of time this season," Gettler said. "As we proved against Dartmouth, we can hold off a team of that caliber because we're that good."

Last year's game ended in a 2-0 Vermont victory in Burlington. This season's squad is senior-laden and consists of about the same lineup as last year. The Catamounts are currently 4-2-0 for the season which began with two losses at the Air Force Academy Tournament. Vermont lost to Air Force 2-1 and Evansville, who is currently 2nd in the nation, 2-1 in overtime.

Vermont then went on to the Hatwick Tournament which proved to be well-worth the trip as they swept the tournament with four consecutive wins. Their opponents

Water polo joins 3 of NCAA's Top 20 teams at Tourney

By JOHN STEVEN MARPLE
Collegian Staff

Picture Garry Gibbs, football coach of 16th-ranked Oklahoma, getting a call from the NCAA and being told that his team must play their next three games against Colorado, West Virginia, and Southern Cal, the 6th, 9th and 12th ranked teams respectively.

That would be comparable to what University of Massachusetts water polo coach Russ Yarworth and his team are up against this weekend. The Minutemen (2-1) square off against 6th-ranked Stanford and 9th-ranked University of California-San Diego on Saturday and 12th-ranked Arkansas-Little Rock on Sunday. UMass enters this weekends National Invitational at Brown as the No. 16 team in the country.

Facing such a formidable task, Yarworth is neither intimidated or unrealistic. "We have nothing to lose," he said. "We have some specific goals to concentrate on this weekend."

Stanford (5-3), which dropped from No. 1 to No. 5 this week, will give Yarworth's players a firsthand look at one of the top programs in the country.

"They're in a different class from anyone else," Yarworth said. "They're so fast and have big hole men. You have to be realistic but we're not going to roll over for them."

UMass may catch a break on Sunday against Arkansas-Little Rock in the fact that when the Minutemen play them, it will be their sixth game of the weekend. "Maybe they'll be a little tired," Yarworth said. "We've got a shot against them."

Coming off last weekends successful 2-1 start, what will Yarworth be looking for this weekend?

"We need to improve our counter attack defense," he said. "If we don't do this against Stanford, we could be embarrassed."

Water polo notebook;After a couple of stagnant midweek practices, Yarworth got after his troops a little. "We don't want to rest on our laurels," he said.

Students rally against Coke

Mt. Holyoke faculty also calls for campus-wide removal of Coke

By NATHAN KRYSTALL
Collegian Staff

SOUTH HADLEY — Claiming the Mount Holyoke College administration has reneged on a decision to remove Coca-Cola products from campus, some 50 demonstrators rallied for more than two hours Friday outside Mary Lyon Hall, the college's administration building.

Holding placards and chanting, the demonstrators listened to speeches from professors and students addressing the administration's failure to remove Coke.

Last semester, Mount Holyoke students decided by a referendum vote to remove Coca-Cola vending machines and dining commons dispensers from campus. Students voted to remove Coke to protest the corporation's investment in South Africa.

"We want Coke off campus because of the part it plays in the oppression of Black South Africans," Duncombe said. "The South African government is financed by corporation taxes and Coke is the biggest soft drink distributor there."

Kristin Duncombe, an organizer of the rally, said although the administration decided to temporarily stop refilling the machines and the dispensers, the Coke products have been returned to campus this semester.

"The administration thought the issue would die because the people who were really involved had graduated," Duncombe said.

However, Nancy Fletcher, Mount Holyoke's Director of Public Relations, said the students had reluctantly agreed last semester to removing Coke for a three-week trial period after which the campus would decide on whether it should be permanently banned.

"The three weeks are up," said Fletcher. "We're now awaiting expression from the students."

But, Duncombe said, it was her understanding that unless the majority of students clearly opposed Coke's removal at the end of the three weeks, the decision would be permanent.

"I don't see how we could have had this gross of a misunderstanding," she said.

The rally's first speaker, Professor Eugenia Herbert, chairperson of the Black Studies department at Mt. Holyoke, said the students' actions are justified because it is their money that is buying Coke products on campus.

"Demonstrations like this will have an effect," Herbert said. "They have had an effect already."

Jean Grossholtz, a politics and women's studies professor who also spoke at the rally, said the college "cannot allow racism to run rampant on campus."

"We can't continue to be a White institution with a White curriculum," Grossholtz said.

Grossholtz said Mount Holyoke's curriculum derives primarily from the experience of Western Europeans with little integration from people of the Third World. She also said the lack of ethnic diversity among the college's faculty and administration reflects upon the curriculum.

She said the movie "Gone With The Wind" was shown recently, demonstrating the college's insensitivity towards minorities on campus.

"Every other day there's something that slaps Black people in the face," Grossholtz said.

Student Aisha Goss, co-chair of the Association for Pan-African Unity, said the Coke boycott is "more than just an eeconomic issue."

"By boycotting Coke, you're saying you're against apartheid," Goss said.

However, some students said they oppose the boycott.

"Lots of students think it's ludicrous," said student Christine Parker. "It's not going to help South Africans."

Pro-choice activists protest Bush in Boston

By KATERI WALSH
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — Chanting, "pro-life, who's Bush kidding? He's pro-war and anti-women," and "read our lips; hear our voice. All these people are pro-choice," some 300 activists flocked to the Park Plaza Hotel on Boylston St. in Boston Saturday for President Bush's arrival.

The protesters were restrained by scores of police officers, but began shouting loudly and waving signs as President and Mrs. Bush's motorcade drove by around 1:30 p.m.

President Bush was in Boston to address the Catholic Lawyers Guild on social issues. He urged them to "reaffirm the right to life as the most fundamental freedom," the Boston Globe reported yesterday.

"We want to let Bush know that we are not going to stand for this," said activist Lynne Benoit. "We are going to fight it and keep our rights."

Marci Lew, co-founder of People For Choice, a pro-choice organization at the University of Massachusetts, was among several students and local activists who attended the demonstration.

Civil rights leader urges student action

King discusses activism

By CHRIS MUTHER
Collegian Staff

Some 120 students turned out Saturday for the third annual University Student Conference, which featured keynote speaker Mel King, founder of the Boston Rainbow Coalition, and Traci Davis, president of the Student Government Association.

The theme was "Challenging the '90s" with speakers and workshops geared toward helping students face upcoming problems both at school and in the outside world.

In their addresses, both King and Davis stressed that involvement and understanding of diversity are key to improving problems.

King, who opened the conference in the Campus Center, urged UMass students to become more vocal on campus issues ranging from budget cutbacks to Department of Defense-financed research, which he opposes.

"Students at UMass can't just rally on campus, they need to take to the streets and then to the suites," King said.

"There's a difference between cutting the fat and cutting out the heart of the education budget."

King blasted the University's choice to allow DOD-financed research to be conducted on campus.

"We have a distorted and incorrect idea of high technology which won't change until we change out technology of how we relate to each other and learn to appreciate diversity," King said.

He said heavy military spending is causing the United States to fall behind in the economic market.

"This country helped militarize the planet, we have more resources in providing weapons than providing food," King said. "Japan has used their technology developing products that have helped them instead of weapons of destruction and have become number one in the world."

King also touched on several other issues in his keynote address, including development, "power," and the Declaration of Independence and the US Constitution, which he referred to as "a poorly attended dress rehearsal."

Davis spoke on similar issues in her speech. She said a stronger commitment and increased action is needed from students to fight against the budget cuts.

"Students need to get involved if they care about the quality of their education, they need to write letters, make calls, and register to vote in their home districts, not just in Amherst," Davis said.

"Subtle racism, assuming a Black person has a lower SAT score than a white person, or making fun of someone's accent, this is subtle racism and the community must not accept it," Davis said.

In an effort to solve the problem, Davis said the SGA has been working with campus groups to remove subtle racism.

During the conference, students participated in workshops focusing on time management, resume writing, communication skills and leadership.

Van Allen said funding for the conference comes from Housing Services, the Student Activities Committee, and the Careers Center.

Graduate union membership still growing

By KATHERINE T. LAMOTHE
Collegian Staff

The Graduate Employees Organization is growing and it may become an official union in November, according to one of its organizers.

According to GEO spokesperson Cynthia Kaufman, the organization is nearing its goal of 1,500 members, necessary to have the majority of teaching assistants and research assistants (RAs) enrolled in the proposed union.

Kaufman said the group is working on increasing its membership by recruiting current members to an informal "organizing committee," which would attempt to draw 10 prospective members to the organization for each person on the committee.

The group is trying to get 150 committee members, Kaufman said. Currently there are about 100.

She and other members have been talking to graduate students from each academic department to open or re-establish contact among the students, Kaufman said. The organizers went to 30 departments last year, she said.

Kaufman also said there has been no opposition to the proposed union from faculty, members of the administration or undergraduate students.

"It's really a surprise how well we're doing," she said.

In fact, she said, GEO has received encouragement from individual faculty members and undergraduate students. She also said GEO is officially supported by the Graduate

Professors discuss Chinese, Soviet reforms and crises

By ROB SIMPSON
Collegian Staff

The reform movement in China, halted last summer by the massacre at Tiananmen Square and the "revolutionary" wave of reforms in the Soviet Union were discussed at Smith College.

Some 130 people filled McConnell Auditorium at Smith College Wednesday to hear Steven Goldstein, a professor of government at Smith, lecture on the reform movement in China, and Amherst College political science Professor William Taubman discuss reform in the Soviet Union.

Goldstein said the effort of the Chinese government to reform its economy and agriculture has been in crisis for the past three years.

The government's failure to curb high inflation, combined with increasing levels of government corruption and lack of unity, were some of the main factors which triggered protests last summer, including the student occupation at Tiananmen Square.

The events this past summer were only "symptomatic of a crisis that has been going on in the Chinese reform movement, he said, adding that the government's reaction to the protests "seriously reduced the capabilities of the system to deal with what was an ongoing crisis."

"As with any drastic treatment for a sickness, the consequences of the treatment can easily be as life-threatening as the disease itself," he said of the government's use of force to quell the demonstration.

"Much of the crisis that leaderships in socialist countries confront in the process of reform is an intermixture of problems of the old system complicated by the problems created by the reform process itself, either intended or unintended," he said.

The thousands of students and others who united in protest last May were attempting to force the divided government to forge ahead and continue on its path of reform, Goldstein said.

He said the Chinese government is on the verge of a major leadership succession, but predicted that the continuation of reform in China will be toilsome.

"The path ahead for the Chinese reform movement will not be a smooth and simple one, but will be a very rocky and difficult one," he said.

In contrast, Taubman said reform in the Soviet Union is "racing ahead" with glasnost, openness, but stalled in areas of economic concerns and democratization.

Taubman likened the reform movement in the Soviet Union with the Russian Revolution of 1917, in which the government collapsed and the "best organized" group took over.

The current reform movement, which is headed by General Secretary Mikhail Gorbachev, may have even greater potential for change, he said.

Taubman said perestroika, or economic reform, has been slowed because of economic difficulties the nation is currently facing.

"Perestroika is stalled, glasnost is racing ahead and together with democratization [this] has unleashed the series of conflicts that we read about everyday in the paper," he said, adding that these conflicts "pose the threat of civil war and anarchy."

Gorbachev is attempting to remain neutral between the opposing conservative and radical factions, who are now embroiled in a battle over the question of democratization.

"The road down which [Gorbachev] started is to him obviously a centrist road, in which he rejects the conservatives who would stop [reform] and the radicals who would run away with it," he said.

The lecture was sponsored by the Five College Peace and World Securities Studies department.

Indian lands being ruined

By DON McCULLOUGH
Collegian Correspondent

Projects harbored by power plants will light the Northeastern United States while consequently destroying Native American land, according to enviromental activists who spoke at Hampshire College Thursday.

The program, "New Directions in Environmental Politics," featured speakers Winona LaDuke and Ynestra King, part of Hampshire's three-week fall colloquy entitled "Restoring the Earth: Strategies for a Just and Sustainable Future."

LaDuke said money-hungry corporations in the United States are partly responsible for the destruction of American Indian lands.

LaDuke cited the James Bay Region, an area in Canada below Hudson Bay between Ontario and Quebec, as an example of such destruction.

She begged the audience to help stop the James Bay project, which proposes companies sign contracts to build dams flooding an area in Canada equivalent to two-thirds

Preacher discusses religious issues

By JULIE LIVINGSTONE
Collegian Correspondent

More well-known as "Ask Cliffe" through campus-wide advertising, Cliffe Knechtle answered students' questions yesterday about various religious figures, Biblical connotations and misunderstandings surrounding religion.

The InterVarsity Fellowship, a national organization consisting mostly of Roman Catholics and Protestants invited Knechtle to speak at the University of Massachusetts. The group gathers to discuss the Bible and its meaning.

"I'm here to challenge you to think about your faith, why you think the way you do," Knechtle said.

"I'm appreciating the intensity of these dialogues because these are intense issues in life," he said.

Knechtle's intensity in his religious beliefs offended some students. Some said he was too abrasive and intolerant.

Cliffe attempted to explain his demeanor.

"I take them (students and questions) seriously and so I'm willing to go head-to-head with them," he said. "I'm at a University, being challenged intellectually and am coming back as directly and factually as possible. It is not hatred but intensity."

Knechtle told the members of the audience who thought he was hostile that they all had the freedom to leave at any time.

Knechtle's discussion ended with a person in the audience saying, "Just as we respect what you are saying you must respect the differences in our beliefs."

Knechtle graduated from Davidson College, North Carolina, with a B.A. in History. He went on to Gordon Theological Seminary on the North Shore in Boston, and earned a Master's Degree in divinity.

Collegian hires new Multicultural editor

The Collegian's Board of Editors voted yesterday to hire Scott Hill as Multicultural Affairs editor.

Hill is a senior English major at the University of Massachusetts. He wrote as a staff member last semester for the News and Black Affairs sections and as a correspondent the previous two.

"I am looking forward to acting as a voice for the communities that are usually left out," Hill said. "I hope the page is a real voice for these groups."

BEIRUT, Lebanon (AP) — The prospect of peace brought tens of thousands of refugees back into Beirut on Saturday after Syrian and Christian forces agreed to silence their guns and end six months of ferocious fighting.

A newly formed committee made up of officials from the various factions met at a horse track on Beirut's dividing Green Line and announced that shipping blockades imposed by both sides would be lifted immediately.

Arab League envoy Lakhdar al-Ibrahimi told reporters that the group agreed "to work immediately on consolidating a cease-fire" and to reopen Beirut airport.

The country's only public airport has been closed since March 12. Moslem sources said it would open Monday.

Paperback edition of Rushdie novel to sell in UK this winter

LONDON (AP) - A paperback edition of the controversial novel "The Satanic Verses" likely will go on sale this winter, the Observer newspaper reported Sunday.

More than 1 million hardback copies of Salman Rushdie's novel have been sold since it was published a year ago this week. It is in its ninth month on bestseller lists in Britain.

Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, the Iranian spiritual leader who died June 3, declared Feb. 14 that the novel blasphemes Islam and called on Moslems to kill the Indian-born British writer and his publishers. Since than, Rushdie, 42, has been living in hiding in British intelligence safe houses.

Nine stores have been bombed for stocking the book, seven in Britain and two in California, in the past seven months. No one was killed in the explosions police blame on hard-line Moslems.

STOCKHOLM, Sweden (AP) — Three members of the academy that awards the Nobel Prize for Literature have resigned, and two said they were unhappy that the body did not denounce Iran's death threat against Salman Rushdie.

The secretary of the Swedish Academy, Sture Allen, confirmed Thursday he received three letters of resignation but said they could not be accepted because the academy's 200-year old rules stipulate that members are elected for life.

Author Kerstin Ekman, one of the three to resign from the 18-member body, told Swedish radio afterward, "No human can, at least in our country, belong to an organization which she does not want to be part of. . . I guess they just cannot admit that we quit."

In any case, Allen said the resignations will not affect the work of the academy.

Proposal to censure Duke from Republican state party fails

BATON ROUGE, La. (AP) — The state's Republican committee on Saturday declined to censure state Rep. David Duke for his past as a leader of the Ku Klux Klan.

The committee has no authority to kick Duke out of the party, but the two committee members who worked on the censure said they had sone so because of Duke's past of "promoting racial violence, his anti-Semitism and his neo-Nazi philosophies."

Neil Curran and Elizabeth Rickey, both of New Orleans, tried to introduce the resolution at the party's quarterly meetings. The resolution was tabled without debate.

Curran, an advertising and media consultant, and Rickey, worked for Duke's opponent, John Treen, during the legislative campaign, Duke said.

"Basically, they can't accuse me of doing anything wrong. They can't question my stated platforms. They can't go back into my past," Duke said.

Lee Atwater, chairman of the Republican National Committee, censured Duke after he won his legislative seat in February. But the state Republican party has shied away from any move to censure Duke.

"They voted, in effect, that they don't think it's proper to deal with it, state party chairman William Nungesser said after Saturday's vote.

Majority of Congress in favor of remodeling design of coins

WASHINGTON (AP) — Reach into your pocket for a quarter two or three years from now and you may find a different portrait of George Washington on the front and a flag instead of an eagle on the back.

A majority of the nation's senators and representatives are bored with the money — not how it's spent but how it looks.

They're tired of the eagle, Thomas Jefferson's home and the Lincoln Memorial on the reverse — or 'tails' side of quarters, nickels, and pennies and believe Americans want new coins not so fixed in the past.

At least 250 of the 435 House members and 66 of the 100 senators have signed on as cosponsors of legislation originated by the US Commission of Fine Arts calling for new coins.

Under a bill approved by the Senate in June without opposition and now working tis way through the House, the Treasury Department would be required to modernize their designs, beginning with the quarter.

The weight, size, and color of each coin would not change. And portraits — although not the same ones — of Abraham Lincoln, Jefferson, Franklin D. Roosevelt, Washington and John F. Kennedy would still adorn the obverse or 'heads' side of the penny, nickel, dime, quarter, and half dollar.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted

Clarifying points made by editor

One of the first rules Collegian writers are taught is that when you put your name in the paper, you become responsible for all words with your name, including the misunderstood, misspelled and poorly written.

David R. Mark

Last Tuesday, I wrote what I thought was a concise analysis of my trip to the West Bank ("I came, I saw and got stoned in the West Bank,") and the Israeli dominance over Palestinians, most of which — interrogation, censorship and general demeanor — the 15 members of our group found disgusting.

Unfortunately, my analysis became to others, the work of a lunatic. I was called a racist and a bigoted Zionist idiot. I was called a few other things as well, but I'll spare you.

People then started calling for my resignation, but I thought, this has happened before. I don't have to worry.

Now there is a table on the Concourse, and I am worried. Apparently, some of my sentences were far from clear. So unclear, that I have become the target of a very well developed protest.

So I re-read my column, and I feel the need to re-write sentences in question, sentences so poorly written that they caused outrage among several campus communities.

The UN is supposed to be a neutral organization.

This conclusion is based on what I learned in high school history class, Marlboro (NJ) High School.

In fact, the UN representatives we met. . .

One who we believed lied, as I wrote in the next paragraph.

. . .were sickenly (sic) pro-Palestinian.

What I meant was, these representatives of the United Nations, people I thought were neutral onlookers, were so one-sided — so much so that they lied — that I was sickened.

Unfortunately, those words led people to think I was racist. The words do not mean that to be Palestinian is a sickness. That's not what I meant or believe. I believe Palestinians are a people to be treated with respect like any other people.

Regarding our group not believing an Israeli soldier shot a three-year-old Palestinian girl: I wrote that not because it was so unbelievable, but because we thought the UN representative had lied to us and we didn't trust him.

Finally, people asked why I said: None in our group, Christian or Jew, believed him.

There were 10 Christians and five Jews in our group and I did not want people to assume the group was completely Jewish.

Hopefully this clears things. I'm sorry if I offended you.

On a separate point, I have heard many rumors regarding the Multicultural Affairs section. To clarify:

1) An editor, Scott C. Hill, has been hired and will be paid like any other editor.

2) He is working with others to build a staff for the section.

3) There is no relation between changes in the section and the speech given by Minister Louis Farrakhan last semester.

The name change, a staff decision, came for two reasons:

1) Representatives of the Hispanic and Asian communities each spoke to us, as they have for years, to discuss separate weekly pages for their communities.

2) Our difficulties in staffing the Black Affairs page.

Why we had difficulties staffing the page is a combination of problems among our staff, past and present, and the Black community, and other reasons dating more than 20 years.

If anyone has questions, comments or concerns, please talk to Cosmo Macero Jr., our managing editor, or me.

Can I call this home?

I wake up to funky music on a radio station, and the first glimpse of day is interrupted by an oversized black poster of the Smiths, a band I loathe.

An orange (or is it yellow?) towel on top of the bedroom door falls from its height to bid me good morning.

Alise Harfield

I almost fall into the hamper inside the closet after tripping over some 20 pairs of loafers.

A musty smell emerges from the bathroom. Or is it the kitchen?

There is a cardboard cylinder in the bathroom that should be full with soft, patterned white toilet paper. But it isn't.

There is long hair, brown, in the sink. On the faucet. Hanging from my toothbrush.

A navy blue fluffy rug awaits my rear from atop of the toilet seat. Do I vacuum it? Shampoo it? I thought rugs were for hard wood floors.

Where the heck am I?

I'm in a one-third version of home, my new off-campus apartment. Not only is it my home, but the home of two other female students, each of whom brought with her the stuff, habits, food, cleansers and oddities that make her unique.

And make me, well, inquisitive.

Like, why do we keep "Snausages" on top of the refrigerator — when the dog who is accustomed to eating them lives in New Jersey?

Why is there a glass bottle of sea weed on top of the microwave? My roommate claims it's "tarragon vinegar," but I know better. She's from Cape Cod. It's seaweed.

What are the two matzo-ball looking creations suspended in a glass jar in the refrigerator really for? A scientific experiment? Or a new spice to add to the spaghetti?

Spaghetti. Why are there 21 variations of noodles in the cabinets? Fettucine. Linguine. Ziti. Vermicelli. Macaroni. Lasagne. Rigatoni. And 18 boxes of teas? Lemon, English, Earl Grey, Stop & Shop brand (mine), mint tea. I never before drank tea, but one of my roommates does. She doesn't make me do it, but a new habit I guess never hurts.

Besides, you'd never know it was Stop & Shop. Tastes just like hers.

That's not the only lesson learned these first few weeks of apartment (a.k.a. no more dorm doldrums) life.

I've learned that baking soda can be kept in the microwave with similar results as it has in the fridge — none at all.

I discovered what goulash is, and why one would want to make it for one's friends.

Each time I open the refrigerator door my memory improves — from having to recall which tin foil surprise is mine. How old is it? Sometimes it's easy, these refrigerator games. I play mnemonic tricks. The best is, "moldy = mine." Hence, I never eat my roommate's foodstuffs.

Especially not the tarragon vinegar.

Wishing Garnick were honest

Take Darren Garnick: start from a narrow perspective, add some lurid political trivia, out-of-context quotes and the name of a pop star and voila! ("A new Paula Abdul remix?," Sept. 20) The vaudeville rendition of an editorial.

The Collegian recommends I read Mr. Garnick each Wednesday. Mein Kampf is mind-broadening by comparison.

He who sets the vocabulary controls the discourse. For example, what does terrorism mean, really? Webster: "The unlawful use of violence, to intimidate or coerce, or to overthrow a government." Therefore, in this strict sense, only a legitimate political power can apply the label "terrorist." As stateless partisans, the PLO and other representatives of the once existent, now defunct protectorate of Palestine surely fit the bill.

So too the Minutemen of Concord and Lexington.

However, according to the narrow application of the term, it is impossible to categorize the Soviet's downing of Flight 007 as an act of terrorism. Nor was the pointless murder of innocent Iranian passengers aboard a civilian aircraft by an American missile.

These were accidents. Just like the "suicide" of Baader and Meinhof in a West German prison. Or the shooting of Palestinian demonstrators on the West Bank. Or the bombing of an Iraqi nuclear power plant (built by the French, another legitimate government) by Israeli fighter-bombers in peace time.

So Yarrar Arafat is "living it up" in five star hotels? Should they set up an NPA policy, just like golf courses with an NJA (No Jews allowed) policy?

Who ever said being a crafty public relations man was bad?

If it works for the Republican party, why not for the Palestinians? Or aren't non-westerners supposed to appropriate foreign methods?

Garnick could have saved me a lot of trouble reading his not so interesting prose by simply being honest.

All he had to do was prepare a list of things he finds distasteful — the Pope, Kurds, "wimpy" Western diplomats, and people who take on "legitimate" establishments in general. Like the Minutemen at Concord and Lexington.

Maybe he's been watching too much Rambo.

Balancing stress with good times

Two weekends ago, I sat on the beach in Falmouth and watched the pounding waves carry the sand and rocks in and out.

But I had escaped the tide. I was not at school doing normal college stuff. I was no longer a student number to Whitmore or a phone number to the pizza delivery man. I got away.

Gayle Long

Four friends and myself headed out to go to the REM concert to stay for the weekend at one of their homes. None of us realized that it would be more than a concert, and what we learned about ourselves.

As we finally drove off-campus on Friday afternoon, I could feel the pressures of the week slowly ease away. The conversation changed.

Heather no longer practiced her Russian out loud, and Julie forgot about her sneaker that had been stolen from the washing machine.

We discussed the concert, the chance to escape the dorm scene.

The concert itself put us into an exhilarating mood and for hours afterward, no one said very much. We had become entranced not only with the music, but the atmosphere and the company.

There was a feeling among us that can only be described as comradeship.

All of us were free from the tyranny of assignments and papers; using our energy on something besides work was a joy.

So we celebrated being young and being together.

All of us basked in the glow of our adventure world. Garron's parents kept us for two days, never letting us go hungry.

We felt like small children being coddled and taken care of — with a mound of blueberry pancakes waiting for us when we woke up — packing a killer lunch for us to take to the beach, and pasta when we returned.

No one can deny the fact that food is a major factor, for any college student, eating at home without having to wait in line and carry a tray of food that is bland at best.

It made us feel cared for, special and very lucky.

But food was not the real reason for our contentment.

We went to the Cape under cloudy skies, and as we swam, it rained.

But the weather did not change our carefree attitude, as the five of us changed out of our wet clothes and investigated Wood's Hole aquarium.

Although it felt like a field trip, we learned the importance of retaining our youth, and not trying to grow up too quickly.

That evening, a weird thing happened.

We all sat in front of the wood stove, as the kindling crackled and snapped, we automatically pulled out our books. Sprawled all over the living room, we knew that although it was great to ditch it all, there was responsibility.

Our work became a part of the weekend, and though we could have gone out, rented a movie or just talked, we all knew it had to be done.

But I don't think any one of us minded.

We did it in silence, and because we had been enjoying life for its less serious qualities all day, our work seemed less tedious, and maybe that much more important.

It was a fabulous weekend, one I will remember for a long time.

It reminded me that a little diversion, a balance of pressure, and responsibility is the best way no to go crazy.

I think that will keep me from being dragged under.

Community College and a member of People for a Socially Responsible University, said, "I don't really approve of abortion per se, but I don't approve of somebody else dictating their morals."

He added, "How much can a man understand what it's like to be pregnant? I can try, but I don't get very far."

The abortion issue has been the topic of much debate in recent months, particularly since the US Supreme Court's July 3 decision which allows states to restrict publicly-financed abortions.

According to Carol Koti of the national pro-choice organization "Refuse and Resist," there was a surge in interest and activity in the days following the June decision.

"Right after there was quite a groundswell," Koti said. "People were all in the streets. It was amazing the breadth of people who responded."

"Now," Koti continued, "people really want to do more than come out into the streets. They really want to get into strategy and figure out how to take these people on. That's what things like today are all about."

Operation Rescue failed in their attempt to close the clinic and some 50 members were arrested, according to pro-choice activist Hillary Roberts. No pro-life activists were seen at the Park Plaza protest.

While none of the pro-choice activists were arrested at Gynecare, the police, who had relegated the two opposing sides to either side of the street, did threaten to arrest them.

Lew, speaking of the police threats, said, "We weren't even breaking any laws."

Lew said it is important to confront members of Operation Rescue at the clinics because the pro-life blockades represent the most basic infringement on women's rights.

"The issue becomes much more real, and more immediate," she said. "It tends to be the point when you become committed to the cause."

Following the protest, many activists went to a conference on reproductive rights for the disabled, sponsored by the Disabled People's Liberation Front.

One participant in the conference, Jeanne Buron, said, "I think what it's about is, do you want the government telling you what to do? I'm 60 and I remember very well the government giving abortions to young girls who were in trouble but didn't understand their situation."

The only consideration has to be choice for the mother," Burton said. "Anything else won't work and anyone who says it will I think is sadly mistaken."

James Bay One flooded 11,000 square kilometers, destroying the homeland of Native Americans, poisoning water with mercury, and drowning 10,000 caribou in 1984, LaDuke said.

James Bay Two will provide electrical power for New York and New England, while most Native Americans in the James Bay area still have no electricity.

"The destruction of James Bay will have the same effect as the destruction of the rain forest, all to keep the lights on in New York," LaDuke said.

If James Bay Two goes through, James and Hudson Bays will be dead ecological areas within fifty years, she said.

"The impact may be further down the line, but it's just as dangerous as having a nuclear power plant in your backyard," LaDuke said. "We are asking people to stop the contracts."

Student Senate and may seek official endorsement from the Student Government Association and the Faculty Senate at a later date.

Chancellor Joseph Duffey is also supporting the proposed union as a new lobbying group, Kaufman said.

"There's less pressure on the Chancellor's office because we can push [for graduate concerns] at the Statehouse," rather than let Duffey lobby for them, Kaufman said.

Last May, GEO became affiliated with District 65 of the United Auto Workers union, he said. Other employees represented by the union are daycare workers and employees in human service agencies.

She said the resources the union offers GEO, including two full-time, professional staff members, help the group in planning.

"They have so much more experience [in labor relations] than we do," Kaufman said. "They have some good ideas for organizing."

Graduate employees' are also demanding a raise in stipends for TAs and RAs from an average of $6,000 to $8,000. Kaufman said the low stipends force graduate stipends to take second jobs and juggle them with their classes.

"We'd be able to work harder at teaching if we had more money," she said. " We want the stipend to be a livable wage."

ARTS & LIVING

Author Kidder candidly shares his reality

By JAY BRIDA
Collegian Correspondent

It's difficult to pigeonhole Pulitzer Prize winning author Tracy Kidder. First of all, Tracy Kidder is a man, and secondly, he writes non-fiction books. Although one may be apt to yawn, don't, or you may offend this man of extraordinary talents. His books are a paramount example of the trite old adage, "You can't judge a book by its cover."

The subject matter isn't exactly eye-popping — the evolution of computers (Soul of a New Machine), the trials of building a new house (House), and the year in the life of a fifth grade teacher (the brand new Among Schoolchildren) — but therein lies Kidder's genius, he gives them life. One Wednesday night at the Northampton Center for the Arts, I set out to find what, and who, Tracy Kidder was.

What and who I found was quite a relief from what I had expected. Kidder spoke openly, without pretense and conceit. He openly admitted to being lucky when he caught his big break, and said that if he were still struggling, he would despise the writer who made it the way he did. The audience, comprised mainly of struggling authors of the Northampton wine-and-brie set, squirmed in their seats.

A surprising part of this whole evening, was that at no time was he trying to sell his new book, Among Schoolchildren; this was, after all, a promotional tour.

Someone asked him, "What were you trying to say about public education in your new book?"

He paused for a moment before replying, "I don't know, I just try to write interesting stories."

The modest Kidder is selling himself short. Among Schoolchildren is not merely a story, it is a window to a world we do not want to see. It is a chronicle of urban blight and the frustrations of dedicated inner-city schoolteachers, and because it is non-fiction, its characters are as real as their problems.

The book was written from Kidder's year long observation of a fifth grade class in Holyoke, Massachusetts. That's right, urban blight right here in the Happy Valley, a very sobering thought. Its drama stems fom the exploits of the idiosyncratic children, and the struggle of a caring schoolteacher to hold it all together. The book speaks volumes on the scope of social problems we have in America, including child abuse, urban violence, indifference in the home and public education. Whether or not Kidder was openly trying to make a statement with this book, he did.

Unfortunately, that was all that was spoken about his most recent effort. We were told that since this is his break in the middle of a sprawling seven week tour, we should be more creative in our questioning. So much for my twenty questions. The questions that the rest of the audience asked ranged from the inane, "What is your least favorite city to speak in?"(Detroit), to the informal, "How do you like public speaking?"("I feel uncomfortable.", although he gave the commencement speech right here at UMass last year), to the inaudible, "When you were a struggling author, did your agent help out much?" ("No, that's why I was struggling."). Kidder handled all of the questions with, if not aplomb, as least honesty.

My favorite comment of the night was when asked if he resented not getting a book published earlier he replied, "I really can't blame them. I think that there are too many books being published as it is," which gave all of the fledgling authors a great slap into the reality of publishing business. He gave us other tricks of the trade, like how one really cannot make a living writing freelance magazine articles, and how some authors are worth their ten percent.

The night became, "The literary world according to Tracy Kidder." Which, because of his charming, unpretentious manner, was fine for all in attendance.

Acoustic Hitchcock delights all with both story and song

By JODY GABIN
and AL KAUFMAN
Collegian Staff

Robyn Hitchcock
Bluewall
Sept. 23, 1989

If Robyn Hitchcock hadn't decided to become a singer, he could have become a successful comedian or mime. As it is, he proved to be the creative, slightly off-the-wall performer he's thought to be, much to the delight of a near-capacity filled Bluewall crowd.

Hitchcock, who has a solo album due out on A&M Records shortly, performed mainly new material, but included a few older songs as well, such as "Glass" and the infamous "My Wife and My Dead Wife" from his Fegmania album, and "I've Got a Message For You"(which, in one of his pre-song dirges he claimed, "This is a song that my parents used to sing to each other.") from Invisible Hitchcock.

Strolling onto the stage to greet a relaxed, seated audience, Hitchcock launched into a theatrical, mime-like history teacher imitation, which eventually developed into an analogy about man's inability to communicate effectively. It's this type of between-song banter that Hitchcock has become famous for, and by making use of this talent, he managed to keep the crowd attentive, and in stitches.

The usual Psychedelic/Syd Barrett comparisons aside, Hitchcock, no matter how bizzare or random his subject matter may seem, is a master storyteller. Stories about subjects that ranged from oral hygiene during the Renaissance era, to his compulsion to knife his sister at the sound of a James Taylor ballad ("I never did listen to a whole James Taylor song. But whenever one came on, I used to get my knife out and start carving up my sister."), were told in stream-of-consciousness style.

His words were delivered like rapid-fire, somewhat like the images asssociated with a Scorcese film, and were, at times difficult to fully comprehend. It felt like he was constantly one step ahead of the audience, and we were laughing one joke behind. His portrayal of a paranoid star who was worried that someone would crawl under the stage and scare him from behind was particularly riotous.

REVIEW

An interesting fact about Hitchcock's stage presence (or what could be called a stage "act"), is that according to members of the audience who had seen him before, he rarely tells the same story twice. His banter, which at times seems like it must be rehearsed and recited over and over again, is actually spur-of-the-moment, and right off the top off of his head. Surprisingly unpretentious, Hitchcock attempted to destroy the God-like image commonly associated with rock stars, by including numbers such as the ballad "Queen Elvis" (which, oddly enough, is not included on his Queen Elvis album.), and "You're a Loser"("You got your picture taken with Brian Jones/But now he's just a heap of bones/But that's still better than you/You're a loser.").

As he put it, "You could say rock n'roll is a bunch of young kids getting their teeth pulled for money, in which case, why do the Stones have any teeth left?"

But Hitchcock was serious at times, and dealt with important issues in a non-preachy manner. He introduced his gay ally song, "Ted, Woody, and Jr." with "I'm not gay, per se, I just went to a good school in England."

He also peppered his serious, but still eccentric ballads, such as "Raymond Chandler Evening," in with his quirky, amusing ditties, like "I Got the Hots For You"("I got the hots for you/Said the denture to the teeth/Said the steak to the tomato/Said the curry to the corpse."), and "Old Pervert."

Opening the show was the local band the Vestrymen. Their sixties-influenced psychedelic sound was a blend of Big Star and REM, and although it's a sound we hear too often today, they do it well and fit the part with the lead singer's Byrds-influenced haircut. Their brief set included three songs from their recently released 4-song cassette, and a cover of the 1973 Alex Chilton song, "Kangaroo."

Am I Black Enough For You?

RECORD REVIEW

I like records crammed with tracks because you can listen to one side, then take a break and listen to the other side later. It gives the effect of having listened to two LP's. This is now a medium saved for the infamous CD format, but Schooly-D's new album (which according to the press information has been made deliberately unavaliable on CD by demand of the artist) is a twenty track album that's loaded with substance, politics and style.

Am I Black Enough for You? is a different album, far removed from his foul-mouthed 1987 piece Smoke Some Kill. On this one he focuses more on informing than shock.

Obviously he praises and advocates Black culture. In fact, the album contains eight tracks with the word "Black" featured in the titles; "Black Attack," "Black Jesus," and "The Education of a Black Man" just to name a few. And all of them are pretty good. It's not the best album, at times it gets pretty boring, but it's admirable by any standard. With people like Tone Loc or L.L. Cool J. around, it's level of creativity and imagination is comparatively high.

The title of the album, according to Schooly-D, is dedicated to "All the blacks who have made it to middle or upper class status and forgotten where they came from." It is an interesting point that unfortunately plagues the black middle class. Schooly-D has not only not forgotten, but addresses this issue in hopes that Black youth will also not forget.

Another interesting track is "Black Jesus," a song that dares to claim that Jesus is Black. "There are White religious figures in so-called black churches and I believe that it would be better to worship someone who looks like you to allow you to relate better. That's why I'm saying Jesus was a Black man." It parallels Rev. Louis Farakkhan's infamous statement that God is Black.

Schooly-D also remembers his days when he was a "Ghetto Nigger" and discusses this on his song "Livin' in the Jungle." "I Don't understand, my man/ We need a plan/ Why I gotta walk with a gun in my hand looking for a fight to excite or rumble/ Don't know why cause I'm livin' in the Jungle." It's a portrait of life in the streets and the things one must do in order to survive, which is the underlying theme in almost all neo-political rap today.

On the whole, Am I Black Enough For You? is a good album, but my only criticism is that Schooly-D's politics are a little too black and white. The "us" against "them" theme is bothersome, because it seems that he can't see any kind of unity between the two races. And it's that kind of thinking that poses a serious threat to Black people. But do buy it if you have an extra eight bucks to spend. It's got a good beat, and it educates without all the hedonistic anti-White aggression.

Phish
Pearl Street
Thursday, Sept. 21

There was so much sweat on the floor at the end of the Phish show at Pearl Street on Thursday night that you could swim in it.

Phish is by far the best unsigned band in the Valley, and they proved it to the delight of the long-haired, tie-dyed crowd, who jumped and danced to every beat of every song.

The dance floor was a steamy mass of smelly, sweaty bodies. Hair flew and perspiration sprayed. Many men took off their sopping wet shirts and danced bare-chested. If the show lasted any longer, the women probably would have done so, too.

Phish is just one of those bands you have to see once before you die. They play psychedelic rock that goes from the Grateful Dead to the fusion sound of Pat Metheny. They mix it all together, and the result is music you've just got to dance to.

There are also their tremendous solos. When most bands solo, the crowd is slowly lulled to sleep, but a Phish solo is only a reason to jump a little higher, bop you're head a little harder and, yes, sweat a little bit more. Whether it be on keyboards, drums, bass, or guitar, every solo was so hot that you could have melted concrete on it.

And of course, they were also damn fun. "If I Only Had a Brain" made the crowd laugh as hard as they moved.

But it was the closing song that was the real killer. I'm not a big Led Zeppelin fan, but Phish's version of "Good Times, Bad Times" was the best live song I've heard in years.

I was too exhausted during the car ride home to care about the awful stench of sweat.

SciFi fans love SCUM

Everyone on campus knows the Tower Library. But only a few know about the Science Fiction library. The Science Fiction library is in the basement of the Campus Center, just a little to the left of the Collegian office. Inside there are over 5,000 volumes of science fiction, everything from magazines to hardcover books. It is part of and operated by UMSFS, the Umass Science Fiction Society.

According to assistant head librarian John Watson, UMSFS is primarily a lending library and social organization. Members go down to the library to take out books and discuss science fiction. Only do not call it sci-fi; within the genre of science fiiction it is called SF.

The tiny room is shared with SCUM, that is, the Science Fiction Conventioneers of Umass. SCUM basically does one thing, according to treasurer Julie Lehrman: organize a SF convention in the Campus Center Hotel. Lehrman explains it takes a whole year of planning to line up guest authors, movies, games, and other events for the nationally recognized convention. This years convention will take place on Oct. 20-22 in room 331, and it is called NOTJUSTANOTHERCON-5. Guest of honor this year will be fantasy writer Jane Yolen. Between Oct. 1-19 it will cost $10 for Umass students and $13 for general public. After then, the price will be $15 for all and $17 at the door.

SCUM has about 25 members who plan out the convention during the year. UMSFS used to plan out the convention up until 3 years ago when SCUM formed out of UMSFS.

UMSFS formed 25 years ago this April. Isaac Asimov helped found the club and is now an honorary member. During the year UMSFS has 70-75 members. To join UMSFS it cost $4 for a semester $7 for two and &8 for two semesters and the summer.

During the year UMSFS organizes many different events. Some of these are scavenger hunts, parties and film festivals. Last weekend UMSFS held a free film festival, some of the movies were The Day the Earth Stood Still, Real Genius, and Robocop.

Picasso and cubism examined

The show, described by the museum as the first attempt to examine cubism "through an in-depth concentration on its core," deals with the artists work between 1907 and 1914.

"During the cubist years, both artists were at their best when they were closest to one another," exhibition organzer William Rubin writes in the catalog. "Cubism as we know it was a vision that neither artist could have realized alone."

The exhibition consists of 390 works, including paintings, drawings, prints, and collages. They were borrowed from museums and collections all over the United States and Europe, and from the Soviet Union.

The French-born Braque lived from 1882-1963. Picasso, a native of Spain who spent most of his life in France, lived from 1881-1973. They were colleagues in Paris at the time they developed the abstract style known as cubism in the early years of the century.

Afriacan Kuti sings of strife and politics

If you are a singer and see your friends and mother killed by police and soldiers, you tend to sing about such issues.

Fela Anikulapo Kuti, the fifty-one year old outspoken Nigerian music star, will bring his 35 piece band, Egypt 80, and his political Afrobeat music to Pearl Street this evening for a 21 and over show.

PREVIEW

In his twenty year career, Fela has been Nigeria's most outspoken dissident musician. The government has burned down his house and he has spent time in jail for singing about the corruption and injustices of his homeland. He began his own political party, Movement of the People (MOP), which no longer exists. He is on the verge of starting a new political party and continues to sing on louder and stronger.

Fela does not perform songs that he has already recorded, and therefore plays new material for every tour. Some new songs that he has been performing include such subjects as slain African leaders, African unity and a denouncement of the current Nigerian government. The songs are sung in a mix of English and Nigerian languages.

Fela is also an accomplished musician. Unlike some other politically active musicians, like Bob Dylan and Billy Bragg, whose music takes a back seat to a song's lyrical content, Fela plays intricate, layered melodies that are just as powerful as the lyrics.

Fela, who plays saxaphone and keyboards, studied American jazz, including John Coltrane and Miles Davis, and incorporates it into traditional Nigerian music, creating a distinct and unique sound.

The 35 piece band is comprised of a five woman vocal chorus (including some of his 27 former wives), percussion and hand-drums, set drums, guitars, keyboards and a nine-member horn section. On stage, the often bare-chested Fela leads them with ease. In the over two hour concert, Fela and the band perform slow-building songs with solos, dances, and call-and-response sections that keep the audience enthused.

Mr. Guitar Head calmly amazes

Adrian Belew
Sept. 22, 1989

Adrian Belew has a gloried past as a member of some of rock, pop, and funk's most innovative cliques. Since Frank Zappa discovered him over a decade ago in a Nashville club, Belew has recorded with Zappa, the Talking Heads, Herbie Hancock, Paul Simon, and Laurie Anderson among others. He was also a member of Robert Fripp's reformed King Crimson. In addition, he has recorded four solo albums and two albums with his Cincinnati based band the Bears.

Currently touring behind the release of Mr Music Head (Atlantic 1989), a solo album, Belew visited Pearl Street in Northampton on Friday night, with Mike Hodges on drums and Rick Fox on keyboards.

Belew seized the stage with his cohorts and presented a peak and valley 17-song set, including two encores. The 90 minute show was composed of his new album, some older material and selections from King Crimson and the Bears.

With part of his long brown hair pulled back high and tight in a Samurai ponytail, his high forehead shining in the stage lights and grinning like a proud father, Belew strapped on a turquoise-colored guitar, one of five he would eventually use. He kicked off the concert with "Peaceable Kingdom," a cut from the new album, about domestic bliss.

By the second song, a bluesy composition relying heavily on Fox's bass runs on keyboard, Adrian's army was crowded in close to the stage, a mass of happy humanity.

On "Bad Days," a "sad song with a happy ending," and simple 4/4 rhythm, Belew squeezed out wailing chunks of plaintive riffs, emphasizing what he unarguably does best — play guitar.

Although his vocals were passable and nicely augmented by his bandmates, he had a difficult time reaching the upper register on a few occasions.

After several more selections from Mr. Music Head, he switched to his pink guitar, which he poked fun at, and launched into his hit "Oh Daddy." This remobilized the throng, some of who it seemed, became ambivalent. It's ironic that a satirical, tounge-in-cheek pop ditty has vaulted him to national prominence, after all he has accomplished as an afficianado of guitar. Nonetheless, "Oh Daddy" is a prime cut, plump with buoyant stretches of bending notes and a clever lyric.

In spite of magnetic musicianship, Hodges is a strong rock drummer, not greatly innovative, but solid and right there. Fox on keyboards is accomplished, not flashy but competent. The concert at times was marred by weak material. Belew's virtuosity on guitar overshadows his compositional talent.

REVIEW

Quirky shuffles and straight-ahead rock and blues with a dash of psychdelia succeed most. Belew sights the Beatles ' Revolver as an important inspiration in his life and has said, "My favorite period was when you were able to hear "Strawberry Fields Forever" on the radio. I'm still trying to wave that flag."

On "Bumpity Bump," a blues number from Mr. Music Head, the band churned and burned in an authoritative volcanic boogie. On "Motor Bungalow" (from the new album), a paean to trucking down the open road Belew blasted blistering licks which resounded like a call to arms, rousing the crowd to clap, whistle and yelp.

For the encore, Belew displayed solo more of his wizardry with "some digital guitar toys," and conduded with one last rocker with his mates. A hearty ovation followed.

Rounder recording artist Wall Matthews opened the show, with a truncated, four-song set. Displaying a deft touch on six and twelve-string guitars, he introduced "The Traveller" and "Riding Horses," two vividly imaginative original compositions.

Craft Center for the creative

By HEATHER RONOVECH
Collegian Correspondent

Where on campus can you go to create your own tye-dye t-shirt, develop your own photographs, or design a pair of silver earrings? Just drop in at the Student Union Craft Center, located across from the Hatch.

Anna Dolan, the head staff member of the Craft Center and a graduate student in theater said, "The atmosphere here is relaxed and creative. In such an academic and stressful environment as UMass, it's a nice place to get away from it all and design a craft at your own pace."

"A lot of people are intimidated by artwork," said Dolan. "But when they realize how easy it is to make a craft, they become more comfortable with the idea."

Many student groups utilize the Craft Center for desigining promotional pins or t-shirts.

Some of the more popular activities among the many available include ceramics (there is a kiln on hand for use.), a darkroom, and jewlery making.

Sally Kriz, a freshman journalism major said, "I just came in here today to make a basket. The people are very friendly, and I can ask them any questions I may have about what I'm working on. It's a pretty open atmosphere."

Most crafts take less than a month to make, and most of the materials can be purchased in the Craft Center for a small cost. Tools are also available.

In addition, month-long workshops are offered for certain crafts, at a cost of $8. The workshops usually meet once a week, during the evenings from 6-8 p.m.

The Craft Center is open from 10-6, Monday-Friday, and is open to all UMass students.

Jerome Bledsoe, held to just 54 yards rushing, returned a kickoff to the Maine 24 and followed with a 4-yard score on a reverse pitch. It was his first of three touchdowns and narrowed it to 19-10 at intermission.

But that was as close as it would get, the teams doing nothing but trading scores throughout the second half.

Buck's second toss to Roth, a 33-yard in-stride shot at the goal line made it 26-10. Bledsoe's second TD, a 1-yard dive over the pile sliced it to 26-16 after three quarters.

Buck scored on a 1-yard sneak just nine seconds into the final period before UMass struck again, Bledsoe capping the drive from eight yards out. Down 33-23, the Minutemen had a chance to move even closer after taking over on a punt at the Maine 39.

"Anything makeable, like fourth-and-5 or less and we would have gone for it," Reid said. "We weren't holding them, but we had to get to four-down territory."

Maine was forced to punt, but UMass coughed up its last chance when flanker Ron Blauvelt fumbled after a 22-yard pass play. Maine took it in one last time, Buck finding Roth from 12 yards with two minutes left.

For the final two minutes of each half, the officials kept time on the field. Corner kicks (8/UMass-7/UVM) and shots on goal (19-19) abounded, yet, after that goal, UMass didn't seem to hold the momentum they had been building up the first and second halves. "For about 80 minutes in the game we didn't allow Vermont to impose themselves on the game," said UMass head coach Jeff Gettler. "After we scored, we just weren't up and pressing. It's a credit to Vermont for imposing their play on us that late in the game."

With less than seconds left in regulation, Vermont's senior forward Tim Kaleita took a corner kick and crossed it to freshman midfielder Stephane Delval who assisted junior forward Mark Zola to score the tying goal of the game (according to the officials there were three seconds remaining at the time of the goal).

To note: two clocks were kept on the UMass bench noting T-minus five seconds at the time of the goal. An additional clock was kept beside the scoreboard noting T-minus seven seconds at the time of the goal. Thus UMass and Vermont went into overtime at 1-1.

Eight minutes into overtime, during a Vermont corner kick, a UMass defender pulled off the post and allowed a goal by junior back Chris Karwoski to end the scoring at 2-1.

"The team should be proud of themselves. I'm happy with them," said Gettler. "The whole team contributed."

"Maureen's an outstanding runner. This was an indication of things to come — it's simply great for the team," LaFreniere said.

A key factor in the win was the performance of the tandem of LaVallee (19:19) and sophomore Precious Hill (fifth, 19:28). LaVallee and Hill made a move to pass the top three Springfield runnes at the 1 1/2-mile point, up a steep hill.

"I really felt good at that point. Later toward the end, I didn't feel as stong," LaVallee said. "I don't feel I'm a good downhill runner, but I knew I couldn't lose everything I had worked for."

After LaVallee finished third, Springfield's Kelly MacDonagh ran fourth at 19:24, followed by Hill. "Precious did a great job. She's only been running three weeks, and she's right on target for the end of the season," LaFreniere said. Hill held off Springfield's Michelle Boissonault (sixth, 19:29) and Sherri Paddock (seventh, 19:30).

Another product of the team's impressive youth movement, freshman Becky Johnson, finished eighth at 19:36. "Becky was a little flat with a week's layoff [sprained ankle]. But overall I'm pleased with her performance," LaFreniere said.

Rounding out the top eight for the Minutewomen were junior Kathy Holt (10th, 20:04), junior Cathy Crocker (11th, 20:06), and sophomore Michelle St. Laurent (13th, 20:30).

Springfield was missing junior Karen Anderson, generally the team's second runner, who was out with the flu. Anderson finished in sixth place out of 160 runners at the Bryant Invitational last week. LaFreniere gave Springfield credit for the performance they put forth.

"They certainly didn't roll over. Springfield was really motivated for this meet and they gave it their best effort," LaFreniere said.

The team's next meet is Oct. 6, a quad-meet at the University of Connecticut with Brown and Providence. As for the two-week layoff between meets, LaFreniere simply says with a smile, "They'll be working."

In their last game of the tournament UMass played defending Ivy League champion Brown and played their best match of the weekend despite the fact that they lost, 16-14, 3-15, 9-15, and 10-15.

"I'm happy with the way we played, especialy after the way we played at Boston College," Ford said. On Tuesday the Minutewomen will be traveling to Brown to take on the Bruins and it seems that the team is looking forward to the match.

"I know we can beat them." said Ford, "If we can improve our blocking in one day, work on positioning and timing, we can beat them."

On the brighter side, Nancy Sullivan played well and was named to the All-Tournment Team. Also playing well in the tourney were freshmen Sue Richardson and Sharon Panoff. Those two, along with Rachel Bredimere, figure heavily in the future of the team. "They have just been thrown in there," Ford said.

"Overall the match went back and forth all day," Gentzler said. "They won the first two matches while we came back to win the next two. The whole thing came down to our final doubles match of the day. I'm really pleased with the wy we played.

"In the tiebreaks, you really had to hit a winner to get points," Gentzler said. "In fact you had to hit two or three winners. My girls didn't choke. We had girls diving all over the place for balls. It was really fun.

"I ws really surprised with the intensity of play on both sides," Gentzler said. "This was our first match, I knew we would make mistakes. It's still very early in the season, both teams played very well. I'm proud of my girls."

This afternoon the team travels to the University of Hartford for a 3 p.m. match. Hartford is one of the top teams in New England. "They have a new coach this year. He is very good, so I don't know what to expect."

Both also had chances to win the game in OT. The Minutewomen had three shots in the extra period but could not capitalize.

The Friars almost won the game much earlier than they did when they drew a penalty corner early on in the OT. A shot was headed into the right corner of the UMass net with Scott out of position but junior defender Kim Hannigan stepped just in front of the goal line and knocked the ball away.

And then a few minutes later came White's heroics.

Senior forward Kathy DeAngelis tried to pinpoint the reason for the UMass loss. She cited PC's physical play but that was not the whole story.

"I felt that they really worked several combinations around us," DeAngelis said. "They beat us with their passing."

On Saturday, UMass was to open its A-10 schedule against Rutgers but heavy rain forced the officials to cancel the game at halftime. It will be made up today at 11 a.m. (Totman Field).

Perhaps the one real bright spot for the Minutemen was the fact that each member of its top five were only a matter of seconds behind the top five of Northeastern and Brown.

"Overall, we were capable of giving Brown and Northeastern a little better race," said O'Brien. "Our top five were basically only five seconds off each of those teams' top five."

Art Smith led the Minutemen over the 4.6 mile course coming in 21st overall in a time of 23:47. He was followed by Herb Heffner some 11 seconds back in 25th place.

Jon Corso who had been struggling with a stomach virus for over a week came back strong in his first meet of the year as he came in 28th overall, only two seconds behind Heffner.

Rounding out the top five for the Minutemen were Joe Livorsi in 31st place with a time of 24:06 and freshman Mike Davis in 43rd in 24:36.

With the next two weeks off O'Brien hopes to be able to work on some specific areas that he feels his team is lacking in, especially race time intensity.

"The physical improvements are noticeable already," said O'Brien. "But we really need to work on our mental intensity. We need to figure out what it's going to take for each individual to really be ready once the gun goes off. Practice is one thing, but a race is quite another."

UMass professors develop new tennis racquet

By YANA DLUGY
Collegian Staff

This should be a familiar story to anyone who has tried to play tennis. You are on the court, trying to hit the ball diagonally over the net. But no matter how hard you try, the ball keeps flying way too far. When you appeal for help, someone tells you the answer is practice, practice, practice.

Andrew Brown, an actuary from Cincinnati, didn't have time to constantly practice, so he chose the only sensible solution — he made a new racquet, or more precisely, a new racquet handle.

The new handle has only six sides, instead of the conventional eight. Because of this change, only one grip — the Western grip — is used for both the backhand and the forehand.

Brown took his invention to two University of Massachusetts scientists, Dr. Frank Katch, the head of the exercise science department, and Dr. Joseph Hamill, the head of the biochemical laboratory. After almost a year of testing, Katch and Hamill found that the new handle can substantially improve the game.

The handle improved the forehand by almost 14 percent and the backhand by almost nine percent, said a report on their experiments, released last month.

"We never expected to find results of the magnitude we did," Katch said. "Anytime you can improve sport performance by nine to 14 percent by simply altering the basic equipment is nothing short of spectacular."

The traditional handle forced the player to change grips for the different strokes. The new handle allows the player, especially a beginner, to concentrate on the game instead of worrying about what grip to use, Katch said.

The results also showed a 26 percent reduction in forehand mistakes and a 22 percent reduction in backhand mistakes, Hamill said.

Brown was humiliated off the court about five years ago, while playing tennis with his friends.

'Whenever I tried to hit the ball over the net, it went over the back wall," he said.

Brown didn't like the way a conventional racket felt in his hand. He refused to 'shake hands' with it while hitting the forehand and thought it impractical to change grips for the backhand.

Hours were spent in his garage changing the handle so there would be no more humiliation. He'd experiment with the handle, then go out and hit some balls. After about 25 tries, he finally found what he was looking for.

"I hit it [the ball] hard and it went to the other side where I wanted it to go," he said.

He had a great product in his hands, however no one would take his word for it because he had no proof. "I had no credentials in tennis," he said. After some asking around, he was directed to Katch and Hamill.

The scientists were skeptical at first, but after initial testing, they agreed to do some more experiments. "We wanted to find out whether the hand would be placed in the position he said it would be placed in," Katch said.

Katch, who plays tennis, tried the racquet himself and was astounded. "It was basically like swinging a baseball bat, it was like rocketships off the racket," he said.

"A tennis pro in Bahamas said he would give me anything I wanted if I let him keep the racquet," Katch said.

The research by Katch and Hamill has given Brown the credentials needed to be taken seriously by racquet manufacturers.

Although he has talked to numerous companies, he has yet to sign an agreement with one. Brown said the companies are very cautious and want to conduct their own research with the handle.

"These things take time," Brown said.

One San Diego-based manufacturer cautiously shares Brown's enthusiasm for the new handle. "It's a pretty darn different idea," said Scott Rogers, vice president of marketing and sales for Pro-Kennex Inc. However, Rogers said that he is presented with "a million" different sports industry inventions each year.

Wilson Sporting Goods, and Illinois-based company, said it is has heard about Brown's racquet, but has no immediate plans for it. "We are not testing it right now," said Kathy Button, manager of public relations at Wilson. "We're satisfied with our current product."

Katch, although enthusiastic about the racket, expressed some caution on how the industry will receive the idea.

"The biggest resistance will come from the pros because they already promote their individual rackets," Katch said. "How do you tell a pro that this racket is better than the one he's been using?"

Still, Katch thinks the idea will catch on. "The best tennis players in the world will end up using this grip," he said.

Football run over by Maine

Smith and Buck power Black Bears past Minutemen, 40-23

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

ORONO, Maine — Talk about a catch-22.

The University of Massachusetts football team found itself in a no-way-out situation in its Yankee Conference opener Saturday. They avoided being gunned down by Maine quarterback Mike Buck, but in the process were run over by a Porsche in the form of tailback Carl Smith.

The smooth sophomore, who goes from 0 to 55 in about 2.8 seconds, eluded the UMass defense to the tune of 227 yards on 41 carries, helping lead his Black Bears to a 40-23 win at Alumni Field.

It was a familiar sight for UMass (1-1-1), which introduced Smith to the world last year by allowing him 206 yards in his first collegiate game.

"What can I say about Smith," said UMass coach Jim Reid. "We can't seem to wrap our arms around him."

Smith broke two tackles for a 28-yard touchdown run just 33 seconds into the game, and was constantly slipping through the grasp of defenders, when they could catch him that is.

"We thought we could run the ball," said Maine coach Tom Lichtenberg. "We saw some things we could take advantage of."

For the record Buck (12-of-22, 170 yards) wasn't silent, throwing for four touchdowns passes and rushing for another. And the Maine defense held UMass to its worst effort of the year, an impressive performance by the nation's ninth-ranked team (4-0).

"I thought Maine played really well. They're an excellent football team," Reid said. "They are well-rounded and strong up front on both sides. They put a lot of pressure on us."

In more ways than one. UMass fought against the wind (literally) the whole game after spotting the hosts a dozen in the game's first five minutes.

After taking the opening kickoff, UMass went three downs and out. Punter Marco Gabrielli's first effort was blocked, setting Maine up for Smith's score on their first play from scrimmage.

After another Gabrielli punt against the wind and a heavy rush yielded just six yards, Buck came back and nailed flanker Steve Roth from 18 yards out, the first of three hook-ups with Roth for scores on the afternoon. The PAT was missed for the second straight time, but just like that, 12-0 with only 4:35 gone.

UMass had a chance to slice it in half on the ensuing drive, but quarterback Roger Baldacci (16-of-34, 202 yards, three interceptions) underthrew a wide-open Mike Tobin in the end zone on third down. Gabrielli followed with a 25-yard field goal.

Maine put blowout thoughts in the Parents' Day crowd's heads as Buck found Mark Dupree with a 14-yarder to make it 19-3 with 22 seconds left in the quarter. But the momentum shifted as the teams changed sides and UMass had the gusty wind at its backs.

Men's soccer team finds no justice

Falls to Vermont in OT, 2-1

By ADRIENNE MATT
Collegian Staff

First it sprinkled, then it rained and then it poured.

Saturday the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team met not only with the aftermath of Hugo, but also atrocious officiating. The Minutemen, who lost in overtime, 2-1 to Vermont, played their best game this season and yet were denied a goal, cheated out of their shorts and just plain stomped on by the game's officials. They dismissed blatant fouls, blew the whistle after the fact and then ignored a goal when it was crucial.

Do they really work for Footlocker and thought it would be fun to wear their uniforms outside Hampshire Mall? The world will never know.

The scoreless first half was tightly-played and tension-building. Twenty minutes into the second half the tension culminated when a foul was called on Vermont in their end of the field and UMass took full advantage. Junior midfielder Peter McEvoy assisted sophomore back Dan Lawrence to score the first goal of regulation. "It was an absolutely beautiful shot," said Vermont head coach Ron McEachen.

Ten minutes later, UMass chipped in a shot which glided through the goalie's hands to land just over the goal line. A Vermont defenseman cleared the ball and the goal was never called. Vermont players agreed it was a goal.

Field hockey stopped by Providence

Hosts Rutgers this a.m.

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

Just hours before Hurricane Hugo rained out Saturday's game with Atlantic 10 rival Rutgers University, Providence College brought its own winds to Totman Field, edging the University of Massachusetts field hockey team, 2-1, in overtime.

The Minutewomen were not catching the tail end of a storm though. The Friars, now 7-0 after a 4-1 win over Fairfield University yesterday, are ranked No. 3 in the nation by the NCAA and No. 1 in the Northeast Region.

Providence upheld the validity of that poll, at least for now, by outshooting UMass 25-15. Five of PC's shots came in OT after the Minutewomen (3-2, ranked ninth in the nation, and tied for third in the Northeast) had rallied back from a 1-0 deficit in the second half.

Providence junior Cami White put the game-winner away with just 1:53 left in overtime when she broke in alone on UMass freshman goalie Phillipa Scott (12 saves, one in OT). White unleashed a soft groundball from about 10 yards but it was directed toward the far left hand corner of the net where Scott fell after her diving attempt to save the fluorescent orange ball. The goal put PC up 2-1 with most of the 10 minute overtime gone. UMass was unable to mount an attack the rest of the way.

"Providence did exactly what we thought they were going to do," UMass coach Pam Hixon said.

Hixon felt that Providence's play would be very physical as compared to the Minutewomen's finesse game. It was reminiscent of one of the old Celtic/Laker battles with UMass playing the game "the way it is supposed to be played" to quote the Laker analysis.

"We are aggressive and we play hard," PC coach Jackie Gladu said. "I think UMass plays just as hard as we do. I think UMass plays the same game we do."

In the first half with rain falling steadily, both teams played to a standstill until the last few minutes when Friar forward Karen Krawchuck picked up a loose ball in front of the UMass net and tucked it in the left corner with 2:18 left in the first to send Providence into halftime with a 1-0 advantage.

The Minutewomen came out of halftime though with fire in their eyes and kept the attack on Providence goaltender Debbie Hagie (eight saves, two in OT). After UMass drew a penalty corner, Bernie Martel let a shot go from about three yards in back of the top of the circle. The ball was deflected on the way through falling to the stick of UMass sophomore Dawn Trumbauer who tied the game up with 20:18 left in the second half.

Women's x-c tops Springfield

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Correspondent

Although the sky overhead was dark and threatening, there was nothing but sunshine on the faces of the University of Massachusetts women's cross c?in, 19-38 over Springfield College here Saturday.

Leading the pack for the Minutewomen was senior captain Shana Smith, followed by talented and tenacious freshman Maureen Meldrin and junior Laura LaVallee in second and third, respectively. Overall UMass captured seven of the top 11 spots.

Coach Julie LaFreniere was ecstatic with the performances of her team, particularly those of two-time MVP Smith and Meldrin.

"It's hard to get a real gauge on how her time stacks up," LaFreniere said of Smith. "It's the first time we've run on this course. But she finished first by 30 seconds [a time of 18:45] on a very hilly course, so that really tells you something."

Meldrin, in just her second collegiate meet, finished a strong second in 19:15.

Minutemen sixth at Dartmouth

By JON REIDEL
Collegian Staff

In a race that included two of the nation's top 10 cross country teams, the the last thing the University of Massachusetts men's cross country team wanted to be was tentative.

According to coach Ken O'Brien that may well have been the main reason for his team's lackluster sixth place out of nine team finish on Saturday at Dartmouth College in Hanover, NH.

"Physically, yes we have improved," said O'Brien. "I've seen it in our workouts, but mentally we need to pick up our intensity another notch. When the gun goes off we have to dig a little deeper."

With Hurricane Hugo causing the cancellation of pre-meet favorite Wake Forest's flight out of North Carolina it came down to a battle between Georgetown and Dartmouth, which Georgetown ended up easily winning by a score of 28 to 61.

Volleyball drops three in tourney

By DAN SARAZEN
Collegian Staff

As the season unfolds, it appears that the success of the University of Massachusetts volleyball team cannot be judged by its win-loss record, but more by its character and level of improvement.

This weekend the Minutewomen traveled to the University of Rhode Island for a three game tournament with URI, Brown, and Providence, and although the team came back losers in all three games, they came back with three more games under their belt.

On Friday UMass lost to Providence by the scores of 11-15, 11-15, and 6-15. The next day the Minutewomen ran into what some coaches are calling one of the best teams in the Northeast, URI. The Lady Rams handled UMass like a pinata at a Hells Angels birthday party, beating the Minutewomen about the head and body by the scores of 2-15, 3-15, and 6-15. "They have got a young team and they run a quick tempo," said UMass head coach Carol Ford.

Women's tennis loses to UNH

By C.J. ABATI
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's tennis team finally got its season underway Friday afternoon with a match at the University of New Hampshire. The Minutewomen fought long and hard but came up short, as UNH won, 5-4.

"It was a great college match," said UMass coach Edwin Gentzler. "The level of play was very intense."

Gentzler went to New Hampshire expecting a close match, and that's exactly what his team gave him. The match was decided by three third-set tiebreakers, and the Minutewomen won only one of them.

Team captain Maura Foley, the team's number one singles player, droped the first set, 6-1, but came back to win the second, 6-3. But things didn't work out as she lost the tiebreker.

UMass battled back when number two singles player Gail Girasella defeated her opponent. Girasella also lost the first set but came back to win the last two. She was also part of an exceptionally well-played doubles match in which UMass crushed UNH's number one doubles tandem.

Senate elections draw few voters

By NATHAN KRYSTALL
Collegian Staff

Elections for all open positions in the Undergraduate Student Senate yesterday drew few voters but many complaints from students who claimed the system was "disorganized."

Ross Condit, elections coordinator, said the number of votes that accumulated was "light," compared to last spring's elections, which drew thousands of voters.

Condit, who is also chairman of the Student Government Association governmental affairs committee, said several ballot boxes were not open during the day because of a lack of volunteers to staff the polls.

"It is pretty messy," he said. "We didn't get a lot of people to work the election."

He said the candidates' chances did not seem to be hurt by the disorganization. "It's been pretty fair for everyone," he said.

All 120 senate seats were up for election, with several incumbents vying for an additional term, he said.

About 47 students ran for 32 open senatorial slots from the Commuter Area, Condit said. The figures from other areas were not available, he said.

The election results will be published in tomorrow's edition of the Collegian.

Several students complained of the absence of information concerning senatorial candidates, citing the lack of posters or additional campaigning by candidates around campus.

Sophomore Silvie Llosa, who ate lunch in Worcester Dining Commons, said she had not seen any ballot boxes there.

"I didn't see ballot boxes here so I'm not going to vote," Llosa said. "I didn't even know the election was even going on."

Eric Cady, a student from the commuter area, said students need to be better informed about the candidates.

"I couldn't name more than five or six candidates," he said while voting in the Student Union building. "I'm voting because I have some friends I want to vote for."

Senior Christine Bangs, a commuter, also said she had little information on the candidates. "I just voted for people who knew people I knew," Bangs said. "I haven't heard anything about who's running."

But, Student Trustee Eric Nakajima, who supervised the Commuter Area ballot box, said the election was no different from others in terms of providing information on candidates.

"It's no better or worse than any other election," Nakajima said. "It's the way it always is."

Victoria Clement, co-chairwoman of the Student Government Association Rents and Fees committee, said it is the students' responsibility to inform themselves about the candidates.

"I think it's up to the people who are voting to find out who they're voting for," Clement said.

Greeks put in 2 cents worth

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

A hiring freeze at the office of Greek Affairs prompted members of fraternities and sororities to deliver pennies to two University of Massachusetts administrators yesterday in an effort to put in students' "two cents worth" about staff shortages.

Students delivered pennies to the Dean of Students office and the Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs office in the first of a three-day campaign to call attention to the staff shortage at Greek Affairs, said Melissa Silverstein, president of the Pan Hellenic Council and co-president of the Greek Area Government.

"The University has said they back and support the Greek area, but when it comes down to financial matters, we're not seeing it," she said. "We decided it was time for us to take action."

Officials from the Dean of Students office said about 75 pennies were dropped off during the day. No count was available from Vice Chancellor Dennis L. Madson's office.

A hiring freeze has blocked the filling of all open positions, including the assistant director position which became vacant this year.

Ricardo Townes, associate dean of students and acting director of Greek Affairs, said the Greek area is "categorically" underfunded by the University.

The office is now staffed by Townes and graduate student assistants, he said.

"I am encouraged by the fact that Greek area students are standing up and being noticed. The system is not giving them adequate funding," he said. "They're tired of things and they're not going to take things anymore."

Silverstein said the freeze has placed increased administrative responsibility on the Greek area, preventing them from implementing programs and outreach activities.

New Africa House to reopen Apple computer lab for students

By SCOTT C. HILL

The Benjamin Banneker Computer Center located on the fourth floor of the New Africa House is to begin operation today. Ernest Allen, an Afro-American Studies professor who is acting as coordinator of the Banneker Center outlined the new hours of operation at a meeting of the Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black and Minority Students (CCEBMS) last night.

The facility will be open from 6 p.m. to 10 p.m. for the remainder of the week. Starting next week, it will be open from 1 p.m. to 10 p.m. and will continue those hours for the rest of the semester.

The reopening of the Banneker Center was well received in the African American community because the availability of the center was an important issue in the settlement of the New Africa House takeover in the Spring of 1988.

African American students occupied the New Africa House in February of 1988, protesting racial insensitivity in the University administration.

The opening of the center was a major topic of discussion in Thursday's General Meeting of the Black Student Body. At that meeting, Dr. Ann Quinley, dean of academic support services, promised that the Banneker Center would be reopened.

Due to a lack of funding, the center was open only four hours a day last semester, operating with a very limited staff.

Rick Townes, assistant dean of students, said that the limited funding may have been due to a lack of communication between Whitmore and New Africa House administration.

The center will require additional trained staff to keep it operational, and at present, Allen is currently involved in the task of finding qualified employees.

Math program to be cut this spring

By ROB SIMPSON
Collegian Staff

To many University of Massachusetts students, Tier I mathematics is just another general education requirement on the road to graduation.

However, to others, who are not as proficient in math, Tier I represents a giant obstacle in the path to graduation — a difficulty which will loom larger next fall when the Basic Math Program falls to state budget cutbacks.

David Johnson, the program's director, said yesterday the Basic Math program will be eliminated at the end of spring.

The program provides basic math courses and tutoring to students required to take Tier I courses, he said.

"There's nothing set up to replace us once we're gone," he said. "I don't know what the students are going to do."

The program is a component of the Scientific Reasoning and Research Institute, which uses grant monies to finance various programs.

The program, which operates under the jurisdiction of the College of Arts and Sciences, encompasses about 10 or 12 sections in elementary algebra and basic math to serve some 300 to 400 students.

He said that the loss of the program would mean the elimination of his position, about 12 teaching assistants, and various undergraduate assistants and secretarial staff.

Johnson said the University will achieve more long-term benefits by maintaining the program because of the amount of money the SRRI brings to the University.

"The amount of money brought to the University by grants [for SSRI] is about equivalent to the amount the University spends on the program," he said.

SSRI, which is internationally known in its research in teaching basic math, may be forced to take their grant money and do research elsewhere, Johnson said.

Kwan-Min Lee, a graduate student, and instructor in the Basic Math Program said since no instructors in the Townspeople help Buddhists rebuild temple

LEVERETT, (AP) — Their days regulated by the sonorous hum of prayer drums, a community of Buddhist monks and nuns has begun the laborious task of rebuilding a temple gutted by a mysterious fire two years ago.

This time around, the monks who raised eyebrows in this small towns when they moved in five years ago, are getting help from some of their neighbors.

"They're very warm, friendly, unique people," said Elizabeth Ahearn, one of about six residents who organized a recent dance concert in nearby Northampton to benefit the new temple. "They provide a safe haven for everyone."

The Japanese Nipponzan Myohoji order didn't get such a warm welcome when it first appeared in the town of craftsmen and college professors. Residents were taken aback by the shaven-headed monks and nuns, their prayer drums, their 100-foot-high peace center.

But nowadays, the town is accustomed to its neighbors and residents barely blinked when a group of Camodian Buddhists announced it, too, was building a temple in Leverett.

"There wasn't a peep out of the town when that was put before the selectmen. I think that says a lot for the town's acceptance of something strange and different," Ahearn said.

The origins of the fire never were discovered and the Buddhists still don't know if it was caused by an arsonist or a natural malfunction, said Sister Beth Carter, one of the nuns who lives in a house near the pagoda.

"It was all over by the time we got up the hill," she said.

In the new design, the clerical living quarters will be connected to the building.

"We feel safer that way," said Brother Kato, a resident monk. Living without the temple has been hard, he said.

"The people stroll up the hill and visit the pagoda, but they are kind of puzzled just to see a pagoda and you can't get inside," he said.

"When the temple is built there will be constant prayer," he said.

Only a carved wooden entryway remains of the original building, but visitors still trek up the rutted mud road to look at the peace pagoda, a gleaming white dome with gilded statues of Buddha in the various stages of his life.

A hand-lettered sign declares the sanctuary a place to contemplate world peace and those who take the tree-shrouded road to the top of the hill find themselves suddenly confronted with the curved white shape of the pagoda that seems to float against its tranquil New England setting.

Rebuilding plans have already been drawn up and Ahearn said it probably will take at least $100,000, although that figure is not firm.

A benefit dance this month cleared $1,000 as about 250 people packed into Northampton's Center for the Arts for an evening of Latin American music. The performance by Flor de Cana stirred souls and feast, Ahearn said.

"Everybody danced at the end. It was terrific," she said.

The concert was the first effort to raise money, a task Ahearn said has been made difficult by the Buddhists' resolute refusal to get involved in soliciting donations.

"They just think that Buddha will provide and that's just their approach. That's different from religious groups I've worked with before," she said. "It's kind of challenging to raise money for them."

A one man fight for respect

Native American struggles for his religion

By KERRY HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

The Northern Cheyenne Indian, Bill Tallbull, sat in a room filled with the smell of hickory, holding a cup of smoked reindeer in his hand, wishing he was somewhere else.

This Montana native was a speaker at the conference held this past weekend at Smith College titled "From Arctic to Amazonia: Industrial Nations' Exploitation of Tribal Lands." He spoke about his people's struggle with the US government.

Tallbull gestured toward the United States flag as he said bitterly, 'Why should I honor that flag? It doesn't represent freedom. To me, all it represents is conquests that the US government got by not observing their own laws."

Tallbull was born in 1921 on the Northern Cheyenne Indian Reservation. He attended a government boarding school in Busby, Montana. He served in the United States Army during World War II. Presently, he teaches at a local Native American community college and speaks at conferences to fight for his cause.

His cause is a simple one. He wants people to respect the Indian religion. Tallbull has devoted the last ten years of his life to this task. The issue revolves around the Medicine Wheel located in Wyoming's Big Horn Mountains.

This wheel, which is a National Historic Landmark, has been a sacred site where many northwestern Indian tribes go to make religious offerings. In the past decade, the United Forest Service has endangered this area by lumbering there as well as developing the region for tourism, Tallbull said.

Many people who come to this area take the stones from the Medicine Wheel, estimated at 10,000 B.C. They also take the offerings which the Native Americans place there for the spirit of the mountain, he said.

"People come to the Medicine Wheel, not to pray, not to understand, but to gawk," he said. "If people visit why can't they respect our religion?"

Tallbull makes a 120 mile pilgrimage from his home to the Medicine Wheel on foot every summer. "I am happiest when I am in the mountains by myself, praying," he said.

Tribal leaders discuss effects of industrialization

By KERRY HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

International tribal leaders gathered in Northampton this weekend to discuss the effects industrialization has on their respective cultures.

The conference at Smith College titled, "From Arctic to Amazonia: Industrial Nations' Exploitation of Tribal Lands," featured leaders from Australia, Brazil and Zimbabwe, who all spoke of their tribes' conflict with the industrial powers of the world.

Erik van Lennep, director of the New England Tropical Forest Project and coordinator of the conference, said this issue of exploitation is one that can no longer be ignored.

"We are running out of time to smarten up," he said.

Kinniikenau, a leader representing the Kinniik tribe of southwest Brazil said the Brazilian government promises everything, but delivers little.

The problem with government's broken promises extends to the United States as well, he said.

Tom Maulson, member of the Wisconsin Chippewa tribe said the U.S. government constantly harasses the tribe and violates their rights.

Maulson is bitter about the herding of Native Americans on reservations.

"We don't need to go home — you do," he said. "But there aren't enough boats to do that," he said jokingly.

Van Lennep said, "We are here to bring together people that need to be heard. We need to see a connection between us and our land."

He said conference organizers hoped to link cultural and geographical ties of Native Americans.

AHORA relief money held due to Red Cross service fee

By KATHERINE T. LAMOTHE
Collegian Staff

AHORA, the Latino student organization at the University of Massachusetts, decided yesterday not to send proceeds from its hurricane emergency aid table to the Red Cross, the group's president said.

Felipe Barreda said the Red Cross demanded $30,000 from Puerto Rico Governor Hernandez Colon for its services. Members of AHORA decided not to send contributions to the Red Cross after hearing this.

Barreda blasted the organization for the demand.

"To have them say [they won't provide services without $30,000] is kind of sick," he said.

He said the Red Cross' order is unreasonable because the agency has enough money and resources to go to the island.

Representatives from the Red Cross were not available for comment yesterday.

Research bids hopeful

BY JULIE KOTSIFAS
Collegian Correspondent

Representative Stan Rosenberg (D-Amherst) recently submitted a proposal to Governor Dukakis to award state research contracts to the University of Massachusetts and claims this new policy will benefit both a sagging Massachusetts economy and declining support for graduate research students at state and private universities.

Prospective topics for governmental research at UMass may include social polling, educational studies, and environmental research.

Rosenberg asked the governor to direct state offices and public agencies to seek out state and private universities first for government research, and to give priority to universities in the bidding process.

The bidding procedure for research contracts is a lengthy one, involving first a proposal request, then committee interviews and judging to determine which of the prospects can provide the best services.

"Typically, a $5,000 contract (from a private firm) could add $5,000 more for heat, light, and rent," said Rosenberg. "With a contract between a university and a (government) agency, there are two advantages: One, there's no profit the state would have to pay, and two, the overhead just isn't there."

Rosenberg wants to keep government research within the state system, which he claims can be facilitated with a government-university alliance. "This way, the university has an ongoing relationship with the state agencies. An agency could pick up the phone and ask for a professor to supervise a research project. . . the whole bidding process could be significantly reduced," Rosenberg said.

Rosenberg believes that universities equipped to handle a variety of government research, and that the implementation of more research projects at universities would benefit both Massachusetts and its colleges.

"There are many, many departments in the higher education system with experts in these fields. The idea is to link those departments with the needs of the government. The state will get quality research, and the university will get money to support reasearch and the graduate students who do this research," Rosenberg said.

Rosenberg cites as examples two separate grants from the Massachusetts Water Authority in the amounts of $500,000 and $2 million. UMass applied for these grants with 9 other competitors, both private research firms and other universities. The government awarded the grants to a private firm.

"UMass came in second in a field of ten," Rosenberg said. "If they (the government) had to give us (UMass) priority, then we would have a good opportunity at these grants."

Rosenberg said that allocating research to universities "won't have a significant effect" on the state budget, but he believes the benefits pull the applause meter even farther towards higher education. "Even if we didn't have a fiscal problem we should be doing this anyway," he said.

■ Bill Talbull

Lately, since the tourism has increased, Tallbull has had to hide in the trees to meditate. This intrusion is not one the Cheyenne takes lightly, he said.

"How far apart is our belief in the churches? You have churches and symbols. We have the mountain. I go to your church many times. Why don't you come to ours?"

"[Our religion] is not that far apart. Your religion is a commemorative religion, commemorating a person or incidence. Indian religion is a continuing religion, celebrating the coming of the spring or autumn. That's the only difference," he said.

As he looked around the room, Tallbull watched a naked Indian baby in moccasins playing a leather drum.

He said, "I come to the conferences for the Indians, for those folks right here, not for the white man."

Tallbull has been asked to teach Native American history to students in Chicago, but he declined saying that it would not be fair.

"How can I teach those children of the lies that their government said, the treaties that they broke?" Tallbull said. "How do I teach them about all our warriors who fought and fought and died and died without having them [the students] harbor the same feelings I have?"

Tallbull said that although this fight with the government is an uphill struggle, it "keeps him going." There have been few victories such as the Smithsonian Bill. This is a bill that the US Congress just passed calling for the return of over 18,000 Native American skeletal remains from the Smithsonian Institute to their original burial grounds in the Northwest.

TA focuses on inequality, women's lives

By JORDAN POLLINGER
Collegian Correspondent

Jeanine Maland, a 1981 graduate from the Women's Studies Department at the University of Massachusetts, has returned to her alma mater to continue to pursue her passionate interest: women's lives and women's issues.

Maland, a new Teaching Assistant in the Women's Studies Department, is leading two discussion groups in their introductory course this semester, and is a first year graduate student in the Anthropology department.

"It's important to know and understand our experiences as women," Maland said, "where we have come from, what commonalities and differences exist in our lives, and what strategies we can develop to shape more equal relationships in our day to day living among diverse peoples and nations." After recieving her first undergraduate degree from Iowa State University in 1967, Maland said, the Civil Rights Movement and the anti-Vietnam movement of the 1960's influenced her to examine United States society in a more critical way.

> "It's important to know and understand our experiences as women."
> –Jeanine Maland, Women's Studies teaching assistant

Maland was the health care organizer for the Hospital and Health Care Employees local 1199. A founding member of the Rhode Island Women's Health Collective, an organization advocating for health care service for women and low-income families, Maland was also involved in the growing women's movement and various community organizing projects.

When she arrived at UMass, Maland wanted to study and reflect on the history and contemporary lives of different women within the U.S. and in the Third World, and received a degree in Women's Studies while she worked at Family Planning in Northampton.

Driven by a deep-rooted curiosity to understand more about her own roots and experience as well as those of other women, Maland was interested in how this history related to women's work both inside and outside of the home, she said.

"Based on a woman's class, race, ethnicity, sexual preference, age, family situation, religion, ableness, and other social identities, women's lives are different. . . women are not a homogeneous group," Maland said.

Maland added, however, that all women do share some similarities. "It's important to study our past and our present with a clearer understanding of this diversity. For us in Women's Studies, acknowledging this diversity is key to our learning to work more efficiently together and side-by-side," she said.

As a single parent it is also important to Maland to address the reality of the increase in female-headed households throughout the United States, and in the Third World countries. She hopes to focus on this issue with her anthropology studies on systems of inequality in women's lives.

"Right under our noses here in the Valley there are increasing numbers of people without jobs, without health care, and without adequate food," Maland said.

She is concerned about the alarming increase in poverty among single women with children, as well as the poverty levels of men, women and children of color, and the elderly. "We have to ask ourselves, why is this happening?" Maland said.

These issues are important to all people in contemporary society, she added, not only to women and minorities.

"In the Women's Studies Department, and in the introductory course in particular, we want to encourage all students to try to look at their own experience now and try to put that into a larger context - to make sense of things," Maland explains,

"Students need to think critically about what is happening around us and about the larger forces that are shaping our lives - political, economic and cultural forces," Maland said, adding that by doing this, people can work together more effectively to change inequalities that exist.

Maland said that she has a lot to learn to be a truly effective TA, but she enjoys teaching, and the department is very cooperative and stimulating. She also encouraged all students to get involved in the Women's Studies department.

"In our small ways we are trying to shake up, to reexamine the way we look at ourselves in the context of the world," Maland said, "and sometimes, just sometimes, a new way of looking can become a different way of acting."

Speaker addresses new treatment for endometriosis

By ANNE RUSS
Collegian Correspondent

The latest innovations in the diagnosis and treatment of endometriosis, a disease affecting approximately 12 million women nationwide, show that it is not always necessary to undergo radical surgery as the only permanent cure, according to Nancy Petersen, a registered nurse who spoke Sunday at the Cooley Dickinson Hospital.

Petersen, the director of the St. Charles Medical Center's Endometriosis Treatment Program in Bend, Ore., said that the causes of endometriosis are thought to be different than what has been taught for the past sixty years. The lecture, before about 20 people, was part of a series given by Petersen to introduce people to new ideas about endometriosis, and explain an innovative surgical procedure practiced by Dr. David Redwine, the head of the treatment program in Oregon.

Endometriosis is a condition in which cells that normally exist in the lining of the uterus are found in other pelvic areas. These cells cause bleeding and severe abdominal pain. In some instances, endometriosis may be linked to infertility.

However, "it doesn't seem to guarantee that you'll be infertile," said Anne Haddad, the spokesperson for the western Massachusetts chapter of the Endometriosis Association, a group offering support and education for sufferers of the disease. Haddad said that a support group of this kind is a vital resource for people afflicted by this painful and sometimes debilitating disease.

"It's a very frustrating thing to have because there are not a lot of permanent, if any, kinds of solutions," said Haddad.

Petersen, however, said that the reason women continue to suffer from enometriosis after surgery is because the disease is not adequately understood. She said traditionally, endometriosis has been viewed as a reversal of the flow during menstruation, with blood traveling up through the fallopian tubes, and back out into the pelvic area. This blood containing endometrial cells would be implanted in the lining of the pelvic wall, forming black areas called black powder burn implants, and resulting in severe pain and bleeding.

Based on this concept, the most definitive form of treatment for women was thought to be radical surgery, or a hysterectomy. However, Petersen does not accept this view. She and Redwine are trying to inform people of a new concept of endometriosis. This theory states that the endometrial cells that are found outside the uteris have been present in women from birth. For instance, they could be cells that never made it into the uterus during early fetal development.

Petersen said that if the problem existed outside the uteris to begin with, then a hysterectomy may not be the answer. She said that Redwine believes in conservative surgery, or in just removing the diseased tissues and not the organs. Redwine further believes there could be many more sites of endometriosis than just what appears as black powder burn implants, according to Petersen.

"You really do have to know what you're looking for and what it looks like to make a good diagnosis," said Petersen.

Up until 1985, the theory of endometriosis existing in other places in the body was not met with much enthusiasm in the medical community, according to Petersen.

"However," Petersen said, "If we're just looking for black powder burns, we're in big trouble, because we're going to miss a lot of the disease."

Petersen said that as much as 70⁄ of the disease is often missed. Other non-black lesions should also be looked at as possible sites of endometriosis, she said.

"We got into the concept that any abnormality should be biopsied," said Petersen. As a result, diseased tissues have been found in many other areas than initially diagnosed because they didn't appear as black powder burns, she said.

Petersen said that Redwine's surgery, with only about a 7.5⁄ recurrence rate (percentage of women showing signs of disease even after surgery), may make it possible to avoid some controversial drug therapy programs, and many unnecessary hysterectomys.

People For Choice plan strategy for semester

By DANIELLE BIONDA
Collegian Staff

This is first in a series on local activism concerning the abortion issue.

People For Choice, a pro-choice group on campus, was the brainchild of co-founders Marci Lew and Binky Feldman last semester, as the controversial case of Missouri v. Reproductive Health Services drew closer to a decision in the Supreme Court.

Afraid of women losing abortion rights and concerned for women who were taking these rights for granted, Feldman and Lew generated information about a group that would fight for women's reproductive rights.

"I don't think you can separate women's rights and reproductive rights," Lew said. "If women don't have control over their own bodies, they don't have control of their direction."

People For Choice has had many successes thus far, including the Rally for Life last semester which, because of an overwhelming turnout of pro-choice supporters, became a pro-choice rally.

Yet, this semester, People For Choice intends to become a more diversified, better educated, force for women's rights.

"Our most immediate goal is protection of abortion rights," Lew said, adding that the group will be "fighting for an expanding concept of reproductive rights," including better and safer contraception, a more complete system of welfare, equal pay for equal work, day care, adequate counseling, and sex education.

The group's main focus is the UMass campus, but this year they also intend to incorporate the five-college community.

"We have a new priority of coalition building," Lew explained, "there is a definite need for activism in the area."

And that activism will occur simultaniously at the five colleges on October 3, at 7p.m., as pro-choice activists unite on the sixteenth aniversary of the death of Rosie Jimenez, the first woman to die of medical complications during a back alley abortion, after federal funding of abortions became illegal.

At the University, the group plans to begin organizing "educationals," or workshops on reproductive rights and other women's issues that will be done in the dorms, for student groups, and in the Greek area.

Another issue being addressed by People For Choice, is strategy meetings with women of color and other groups.

"We want to try to create a group that's more multicultural and aware of different positions and issues that we may not have addressed, but need to address," Lew said.

She said the women's movement has historically in some ways excluded women of color, and issues that are relevant to them. "Now is the time, while people are getting mobilized - all women's rights are being threatened," Lew said.

And as their name suggests, People For Choice is not an all women's group. John Zicconi, one of a minority of male members of People For Choice, sees the abortion issue as a "people issue."

"Women may be the ones who get pregnant, but I don't disassociate myself with the entire process because I'm not the one who gets pregnant," he said. "A function that I or any man can have is to make [the group] more accessible to other men."

Meagan Rosser, a first year psychology major, and member of People For Choice said that many people belive that by denying women the right to have abortions, the problem will just disappear. "[Making abortion illegal] will take away women's choice but women will continue to have back alley abortions and die," she said.

Members hope that in the future the group will grow to include other issues and groups in its agenda. "The group can be more diversified," said Andrea Delgado, a second year International Relations student. "It's not only a white woman's fight, it's every person's fight," she said.

Pam Remy, a fourth year women's studies major, summed up the ultimate goal of People For Choice in one simple sentence, "My hope for the future is that someday, we won't need this group."

Barreda also said the money will not be sent to San Juan until the table is taken down on Wednesday.

"We're not doing anything until we find alternative conduits to send the money to Puerto Rico," Barreda said.

"We want to guarantee the money will get to the Puerto Rican people," he said. "It has to get there first."

Barreda said he was also concerned that if AHORA had given the Red Cross the money, the agency might have taken it to St. Croix or St. Thomas, in the US Virgin Islands, which is not where the group wanted the money given.

He said while the group is willing to help other Registered Student Organizations with aid to the other islands, funds raised from the table are strictly for helping Puerto Rico.

Barreda said as a result of the Red Cross' demands, he and other members of AHORA have become skeptical about the Red Cross' actual contribution to the recovery effort.

"The organization doesn't have confidence in the Red Cross' ability to help," he said.

As of yesterday, Barreda said, the table had raised over $500 in donations to the hurricane aid fund.

Polly Pimentel, a sophomore undergraduate assistant in the program, said the program is instrumental in helping students understand math because it aids them in overcoming math anxieties through peer problem solving.

Peer problem solving involves an undergraduate assistant who works with a small group of students to "talk through" their math difficulties.

"The program is set up for students who've had math frustrations all their lives. It teaches you how to reason, how to think things out," she said.

Bush asks USSR to cut weapons stockpile

UNITED NATIONS (AP) — President Bush, challenging the Soviet Union to "rid the earth of this scourge," of chemical weapons, said yesterday the United States will destroy more than 80 percent of its stockpiles if Moscow reduces its arsenals to an equal level.

"The world has lived too long in a shadow of chemical warfare," Bush told the United Nations General Assembly, seeking to spur a 40-nation treaty conference aimed at banning the weapons entirely.

While the chemical weapons plan was the centerpiece of his remarks, Bush also paid tribute to the Soviet Union for removing "a number of obstacles" on treaties reducing long-range nuclear weapons as well as troops and tanks in Europe.

Minor quakes shake Greece with none hurt

ATHENS (AP) — Two moderate earthquakes hit southern Greece today but caused no damage or injuries, authorities reported.

Afghan rebels close highway

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan (AP) — Afghan rebels have closed a critical supply route between Kabul and the war-battered eastern city of Jalalabad, a guerrilla group said yesterday.

About 1,000 fighters overran four government posts Sunday along the strategic 75-mile road near Sarobi, 60 miles east of Kabul, said Masoud Khalili, a spokesman for the powerful Jamiat-i-Islami guerrilla group.

Earlier this year, Jalalabad was the scene of the bloodiest fighting in the rebels' 11-year war to topple successive Communist governments in Kabul.

Jalalabad, located 45 miles west of the Pakistan border, was seen as a test of guerilla strength following February's withdrawal of about 103,000 Soviet soldiers from Afganistan.

But government troops dug in. Despite intiial successes, particularly at the key Communist garrison town of Samarkhel near Jalalabad, the guerrillas were stopped at the heavily fortified city limits.

Guerrilla fighters have closed the Kabul-Jalalabad highway periodically but have been unable to keep it closed beyond a few weeks. The guerrillas' weapons supply will decide how long the latest blockade lasts, Khalili said.

Khalili also said guerrillas still block the key Salang Highway, a critical supply route between Kabut and the Soviet Union reportedly closed in mid-September.

"The United States has sent millions of dollars in military hardware and humanitarian assistance to the guerrillas in the past decade. The rebels, who call themselves mujahedeen or Islamic "holy warriors," also are bankrolled by Saudi Arabia and other Arab states.

New three-piece appliance has students drooling

BOSTON (AP) — A new appliance that can chill beer, freeze ice cream, and cook pizza has college students clamoring, and the inventor, a former computer salesman, crossing his fingers.

The Microfridge, offered by Microfridge, Inc. of Sharon, is a three-piece appliance composed of a compact refrigerator, a separate freezer compartment and a mini-microwave. The product retails for $429.

The company founders did more than stack three units on top of one another and paint them the same color, however. Their machine, which stands under four feet tall, was invented to use no more power than a compact refrigerator.

"Quite simply, when one unit is running, the other one is off," explained co-founder Robert P. Bennett, 33, who said he holds two patents on the Microfridge's circuitry.

Bennett said if a consumer wanted to cook in the microwave, then the freezer and refrigerator would shut off temporarily, and resume when the cooking was done. Product testing showed that even when the microwave was on for 45 minutes, the machine's cooler parts gained only three degrees, Bennett said.

The first shipment of 1,700 Microfridges went out at the end of August, and the company plans two more shipments by the end of November. Sales are expected to top $1.5 million this year, Bennett said, and "the phones are still ringing."

"The biggest problem is going to be eventually we'll have to think about competition," said Bennett. "Once we create a market, either we'll have built up until we're the recognized name, or we won't have, that will allow someone else to come in."

For now, the efforts of Bennett and his co-founders Peter Soriano, 47, and Ed Ward, 37, are focused on promoting the idea for use in schools, hotels, offce suites and military bases.

More than 38 percent of the first shipment was bought by colleges and their students, Bennett said. And students are forming waiting lists at Brown University in Rhode Island and the University of Southern California.

Joseph Zannini, the executive director of housing at the Unviersity of Massachusetts at Amherst, says the school ordered 11 Microfridges for initial testing, welcoming the reduced power requirements.

Lauren Massara, a freshman at Brown University, raved about her Microfridge.

"I think it could almost be considered a necessity if you're not on the three meal plan. You can make breakfast, Eggo Waffles," she said. Because of the Microfridge in her room, Massara plans to go off the three meal plan, she said. Depending on the small college market could ultimately sink Microfridge, Inc., said Chuck Ryan, an industry analyst at Merrill Lynch. Ryan also said the retail price was high enough to be a probable stumbling block.

"I think he's got a difficult sale on a price basis, because college students can by a $99 refrigerator and a $99 microwave and save yourself a lot of money," said Ryan.

According to Bennett, however, a separate freezer makes up for that price difference.

Memories are tarnished by senseless bickering

During World War II, millions of people were mercilessly murdered. Millions. Most of the millions were of the Jewish faith. The driving force behind the massive killings of one particular group of people came from one warped, sick leader. It was his intention that this group of people were to be exterminated, wiped-out, swept off the face of the earth. This tragedy occurred 50 years ago, but its memory still haunts.

In 1987, an agreement was struck, this agreement was to go into effect as of February 1989. This agreement has been ignored.

A building that had been used to store fuel for the gas chambers where many Jewish people died has been turned into a convent with a large wooden cross in front of it. This insulted the Jewish community who felt that the Auschwitz death camp should not be used exclusively for Catholics, considering which group was targeted for extermination.

Due to this protest, the Catholic church — rather, four cardinals — signed an agreement with the Jewish community saying that the convent would be removed by February of this year, with the nuns moved to an interfaith center near the actual site.

Beloved Jews, do not talk to us from the position of a people raised above all others . . . Your power lies in the mass media, which are easily at one's disposal in many countries. Let them not serve to spread anti-Polish feeling . . . If there is no anti-Polishness, there will be no anti-Semitism here.

Cardinal Jozef Glemp

Meredith O'Brien

These do not sound like the words of a man of the cloth, the words of one who is supposed to know the meaning of good will, of suffering.

Nuns are supposed to be holy, sanctimonious and pure. They are supposed to embrace those who have been hurt, and help them with their grief. Stubbornness and insensitivity are not doctrines that most nuns are supposed to abide by.

Poland is having enough trouble as it is, it does not need to be polarized by a religious battle being perpetuated by insensitive, selfish religious leaders.

The nuns were not killed, nor the convent destroyed, because the attackers were stopped," Cardinal Glemp said. The "attackers" he called a squad of seven Jews from New York.

These Jewish representatives came to the site to stage a silent, peaceful protest. Their agreement had been shunned. Yet, these people, who came to the convent on behalf of the millions of Jews who had died at the death camp, were doused with water. The blatant anti-Semitic slurs that were yelled at them only needlessly added to the already tension between the Catholic and the Jewish communities.

Thankfully, though a bit late, the Vatican has finally spoken out. Pope John Paul II, the one who originally proposed the convent at Auschwitz, has officially intervened and told the nuns that they must move out of the the convent immediately. In his communique, he also condemned the remarks made by Cardinal Glemp, as did many Catholic churches around the world.

After the Vatican had tried to diffuse this serious conflict, Glemp rejected the Vatican's statement saying it was a "forceful resolution of the problem, and I don't think that would be a very positive way."

It's high time for people like Glemp to realize that what Poland needs right now is not tension and arrogance, but unity and cooperation.

A war was fought some 50 years ago.

Why can't the Polish mourn together?

Why can't they pay tribute to all of the victims at Auschwitz and be sensitive to one another's needs?

The war is over.

Why should the memory of the victims be tarnished by a battle over ego?

My view of Palestine

In reading recent columns on the editorial page of the Collegian the uninformed reader could easily come away with a dehumanized, racist stereotype of malicious Palestinians. The kind and hospitable people I remember from my journey to Palestine were nowhere to be found.

John U. Davis

In December of 1987 I was travelling in Egypt, and when I heard that this most recent Intitada (uprising) was occurring, I made a point to witness the events transpiring in the occupied territories. I took a bus from Cairo to Rafah, on the border of the Gaza Strip. When I descended from the bus, I was politely ushered into a line for Jewish Israelis and assorted westerners. Palestinians, who had been on the very same bus with me, were forced to spread their legs and put their hands on their heads while they were frisked and interrogated. I was immediately struck by the indignities being suffered by people returning to their homeland to visit relatives, while I, an alien from a faraway continent, was treated with the utmost courtesy and respect.

Though I spent but eight days in Palestine, I used my time wisely, making every effort to get close to the conflict and to get to know the players. I spent my nights in an Arab-owned hostel in East Jerusalem and spent my days exploring the West Bank. I travelled almost exclusively on Arab buses, visiting Ramallah, Nablus, Bethlehem, Hebron, and Kalandia and Balata refugee camps. I was almost always the only westerner wherever I went and, though people wereinitially wary, I was always treated with courtesy and respect. I should add that in my travels of Arab lands I have never lacked for a meal or a place to stay. Generosity and trust seem to be much more a part of their culture(s) than ours.

When I first tried to enter Balata Camp, where Israeli soldiers had murdered five Palestinians just days before, the Israeli soldiers guarding the entrance to the camp would not allow me in, telling me that I would be "in danger". Shortly thereafter, some young children led me to a broken wall which allowed me entry to the camp. In the narrow streets, adults averted eye contact with me, knowing that in these troubled days of the "democratic" State of Israel their talking with me was tantamount to political activity and could result in their imprisonment. Once the children led me into the privacy of their modest home (where their family had lived since they were forced to leave their ancestral lands in "Israel proper"). I was introduced to several Palestinian youths who told me of the horrors of recent days.

In Bethlehem (a Palestinian town in the West Bank) on Christmas Eve all visitors to the Basilican of the Nativity, located on the supposed site of Jesus Christ's birthplace, were confronted with three heavily armed Israeli security checkpoints while being assured that they were there for our own safety. Westerners should realize that many Palestinians are Christian and no Palestinian would ever desecrate a Christian holy place. The Israeli "protection" (dare I say "desecration", to appear at the birthplace of the "Prince of Peace" armed to the teeth) of Bethlehem was a calculated media tactic aimed at demonstrating to the West what "barbarians" the Palestinians are. Sick of this spectacle, I went to leave Bethlehem that evening. The "democratic" State of Israel had ordered the Arab buses to stop running and allowed the lucrative holiday crowds to be transported only by Jewish buses.

These are but a few snapshots of my visit to Palestine. I hope they provide testimony to the warmth and hospitality of the Palestinian people in spite of much repression and suffering.

Does the major really matter?

One of the most common questions asked of me is the one I dread the most. It's the ever-popular question people ask when engaging in small talk, "So, what's your major anyway?"

Answering this question wouldn't be so bad if I didn't have to explain my answer in any great detail. I could lie, and choose a major that everyone understands, saying that I major in English or botany. But for some reason, I am compelled to be up-front with people.

I reply honestly, "I'm a Wood Technology major."

Melissa Macauley

And what exactly is wood technology? It's the study of wood science, the properties of wood, and how we convert trees into material that we utilize in our day-to-day lives.

I would bet that you never really thought too much about how vital wood is to our society did you? That's okay, neither did I until recently.

The Wood Technology department is a tiny department, located in Holdsworth Hall. I'm new to the program, and yet, I already feel at home with the people in my major. Every student receives individual attention, and lots of it. I came away from the "get-to-know-you" reception the other night with the distinct impression that this was more like a family than a department.

I only have one actual Wood Technology class this semester, with all of my other classes coming from outside of the department. I haven't said a word in any of my other classes. I can't help but feel that I am on my own in the "big, bad world" when attending my other classes.

Not all of the other majors are impersonal and cold though. There are many close-knit departments and majors on campus that students are very much devoted to. I am merely saying that people should not dismiss a field of study because it's "different," or because they've never heard of it, or don't know anything about it.

My friends think that I am the only Wood Technology major enrolled here. They may get a kick out of it and ask me questions about trees all of the time. Most of my friends are Engineering, International Relations, or Computer Science majors. I've offered to take them with me to Holdsworth so that they can see that I actually do have classmates, but as of yet, none have taken me up on the offer.

After listening to my friends for the first week of school, I had almost begun to believe that I was the only Wood Tech major on campus.

I called my father — who, incidentally, graduated from UMass in 1974 as a Wood Tech major — and told him of my woes. He told me that it was okay to be the only Wood Tech major that I knew of, and that it would build my character.

I took what he said with a grain of salt. And then after attending my first class, I finally met other people who shared the same major. Now, I spot a fellow major nearly every time I venture outside my dorm.

I have a feeling that I am going to enjoy being affiliated with this department. I like it, and I like the people too.

If you ever begin to feel like just another number here, try to enroll in a little-known class. Find out about it. I can almost guarantee that it will be a good experience.

The lazy people can't be blamed

I am writing in response to Jim Clark's column, "My ticket to evocation," Sept. 21. I was very offended by a comment that Clark made that those "people who are just too darn lazy to mind, parking in handicap spots, on the lawn, or wherever they can find a place" are "probably the same people who take the bus to Orchard Hill."

Although I may be lazy and take the bus to Orchard Hill, I never park in handicap spaces, or on the lawn. I may be lazy, but I still have morals and a respect for the law.

I suggest that the next time Jim Clark "jeopardizes someone else's parking spot next to Boyden," he take a long look at his own morality and respect for others instead of blaming innocent people, lazy or not.

Use your smarts, not the bag

In our ever increasing environmentally aware and concerned society, it has become commonplace for corporations to use deceptive marketing ploys to influence consumers to buy their products.

Plastic bags that have labels on them which make them appear safe, are bad. The wording on many of these products insinuates that they are bio-degradable in sunlight, made of cornstarch or non-toxic. This is deceiving. The truth about these plastic bags is that only a minute percentage of the surface area is bio-degradable, and only when fully exposed to direct sunlight.

The small amount of corn starch used to bond the plastic does not change the chemical make-up of the polymers. The same level of toxicity exists when incinerated.

Do not be fooled! If you are concerned use and recycle a paper bag.

ARTS & LIVING

How to find a man and chuckle about it

By LISA SHAPIRO
Collegian Staff

For her birthday, though not as to imply that she needs any, I presented my roommate with a copy of Cynthia Heimel's Sex Tips For Girls.

Heimel's book, published in 1983, is a humorous guide to sex and associated topics. As this book rapidly approaches age seven, its themes are still prevalent today. This handbook surely will continue to provide compelling reading for men and women, from the sex fiend, to the pristine virgin alike.

The first time I saw this book was late one night while baby- sitting. I had resorted to scanning the bookcase after prime time programming had almost bored me to sleep. As I pulled this book from the shelf, its cover illustrated with fishnet stockings and red pumps, I had no idea what to expect. And as I opened it and began to read, I thought all the while that the psychiatrist whose house I occupied and whose baby I just put to sleep was just about to come home and see me pouring over this book with the dirty word in the title. But when she did come home and saw the book on the couch, she told me of her love for it. After all, she said, it's not filth, it's just funny.

Now, my roommate has never had a problem in attracting the watchful and longing eye of many a young suitor, but this chapter opens with a vivid chronology of a young boyfriendless and depressed woman, who nevertheless, is depressed because she is without, and traces the roots of the crunch phenomenon.

About 1971, Heimel says, was the time that women honestly admitted that, "We don't feel like picking up your socks! We are bored to death listening to football stats! And we don't want to be washing the floors and diapering! Ditto getting laid when we don't want to!"

ARTS ATTACK

The saga continues with men realizing that "if they didn't get sensitive real fast, they weren't going to get laid anymore." So she says, they got sensitive and acknowledged that women needed space and vowed equality, she says.

But things, as they do, went sour.

"Men used to quite a few years of power, found out that there weren't all that crazy about being penitent."

"Fuck it!" men cried in unison all over the world, "We're not going to take this shit anymore!" "One moment guys were running around not opening doors for us, the next minute they were either gay, psycho, or gone. The great boyfriend crunch had begun."

Just to reassure the mass of women uncertain of themselves, the next part of the chapter tells us that a boyfriend is no proof of sanity or desirability, and dispels the myth that one would be loved if only a little prettier, better complexioned, or not such a "seething mass of psychoneurotic schizophrenic paranoic manic depressiveness." Because ugly women, mean women, stupid women and even women covered with hideous warts all (can and do) have boyfriends."

So now we are aware of this problem and try not to feel so bad for not having a boyfriend because we (hopefully) do not think of ourselves as ugly, stupid, or even wart covered. Looking to Heimel for resolution, we are told basically to hang in there and wait for the dust to settle.

But years later, though not in Heimel's Manhattan, but rather in out own Amherst, Massachusetts, I'm unsure how exactly that dust has settled or if its even settled at all.

Today, and most everyday, I see all sorts of arrangements in the world around me. They range from seriously committed, and even sometimes, pre-engagement, to seeing each other. The addition of mind games creates the complicated evil counterpart to this group, along with the occasional date.

Note: There is no need to include the one night stand here. We know it happens, life is too short to lament shamefully for years on an old cracked leather couch, share these stories with best friends. The mention of vocabulary words reminds me of the time in high school when I silently read the essay topic on my English achievement test. It read, "The more things change, the more things stay the same."

Now I agreed with this statement, and if I remember correctly, I used some examples from the field of medical technology to back up my claim. But what I'm unsure of now, is how the application of this statement would apply to Heimel's crunch.

I think in a way, it just may hold true. If things, for instance, you, keep changing, (i.e. going to a new school, switching majors a dozen times, getting a job, etc.) the adage conviently reminds us, that these things in your life are more likely to stay the same.

And this does not always bring good news. So, if you've been in the habit of dating senseless jerks, or on the positive flipside, loving teddy bear types, or anybody paddling midstream, this seems to mean that you are destined to be with that sort of person forevermore.

"No way!" we scream to ourselves as we read this, unless, of course, we are blissfully happy. I hear the same gripes again and again that, "He's not intelligent; I think he's cheating on me; he's not my religion; he drinks too much; he doesn't call when he says he will; etc."

Of course, I do know some of those oh so happy couples, and their happiness I cherish; however, I've even heard the above complaints from the mouths of strangers, in lines (mostly the movies), the grocery, the dry cleaners. So some are happy, the rest complain.

How hath the dust settled? I see no clear indication. Somewhere, I know, there's got to be an escape, an opening to this constant circle of the relationship cycle.

That opening is true love.

Incidently, the chapter after the above mentioned is called "How to Fall in Love," but those tips, and the sex tips promised by the book's title, you've got to read for yourself. All the way through you'll find some hysterically witty truth. Happy Birthday, roomie D.

Visiting theater company from South Africa uses savage comedy to present grim reality

By LINDA SPIERS
Collegian Correspondent

"Morena is back and South Africa has got him" smirked the President, resplendent in a pair of glasses and a clown's nose, as he wiggled about in an attitude vaguely reminiscent of the swinging '60s. An interesting item, the red nose, especially when used as a distinguishing mark for whites-in-power, those who have everything - including the clown's nose. Savage comedy indeed.

Playing to a packed and appreciative audience, Kekana and Mokone transformed themselves into a stream of different characters, sometimes using the addition of a hat (or nose) to indicate difference. At other times they would just position themselves in different attitudes and mimic their surroundings by bodily motion and the use of their voices. A crowd scene of only two people sounds impossible, but was convincingly depicted by a dialogue taking us down to notorious Albert Street, Johannesburg, where black workers brandish work permits at passing cars, fighting each other for "corners" both verbally and physically. Previously, these workers have urged Christ (just arrived from Jerusalem in a Jumbo) "come to Albert Street, Morena," and so he does.

Morena, indicated by the angles Kekana and Mokone held their heads while talking to him, passes through while two characters shout to the passing cars "I take small White children to school," begging for menial work in order to feed their families. "Throw away your passes and follow me to Soweto," says the piece of air, and the formerly fighting crowd respond.

Tragedy is not a dead medium. This scene among others effectively demonstrated that. Kekana and Mokone raced from side to side, brandishing passes, their faces full of sycophancy and desperate hope. No car stopped, and if you don't work, you starve.

REVIEW

But the clown's nose, the grim comedy of South Africa's regime predominated. The exuberant Zulu-boy replies to Morena's injunction to forgive his enemies with "This is South Africa, we fight here". One prisoner becomes irritated at another's singing hymns in his sleep, and two workmen solemnly explain Coca-Cola to Christ. Woza Albert juxtaposed the miraculous Morena against real people, and so made real for us the victims of apartheid. It exploded the myth of the symbol by its humour and satire - Zulu-boy is a hero who fights off Morena's aggressors, but he is also over-sexed and crude. The white pilots (complete with noses) don't want to bomb Morena and complain that theirs is a "shit job." The strength of the piece, even over the awesomly talented Kekana and Mokone is that it makes you think in terms of people, not issues.

Environmental activities hit the Valley

By REBECCA HOLMES
Collegian Correspondent

An ever increasing awareness of environmental issues was reflected in an abundance of local events during the past week.

Out of the Forest; the Fight for Tribal Surivial, shown at UMass by the Rainforests Action Group, is a film about the Kayapo Indians of Brazil.

Uniting with other tribes in the region, the Kayapo stage-managed a protest against Brazilian developers who were planning to build a massive hydro-electric dam across Kayapo territory. The Kayapo emerged victorious, but the fight for cultural survival amoung other tribal nations goes on.

The industrialised nations of the world have a legacy of systematic destruction: from the initial colonisation of American and Australia by Europeans, to the present day commercial demand for irreplaceable land and mineral resources.

The Tribal Lands Conference held at Smith College this weekend sought to address a wide variety of global issues.

Entitled "From the Arctic to Amazonia", the conference heard speakers draw parallels between the impact of development by industrialised nations and the effect on indigenous peoples the world over.

Albino Pereira Cece Kinniikenau of the Kinniik tribe of Brazil expressed the sentiments of many indigenous peoples when he spoke on Saturday of his concern for the future of his tribe and his anger at the destruction of natural world.

The highlight of the weekend was Saturday night's benefit concert. Yaya Diallo and Company delighted the 500-strong audience with their wit and compelling African dance rhythyms.

The urge to dance was impossible to resist, and many seats were deserted for a space in the aisles or at the back of the hall. As the crowd applauded and yelled for more it occurred to me that this would be a very hard act to follow.

Headliners Fortaleza began with a subtle and rhythmic number, playing the typical percussion, pipes and stringed instruments of the Andes. Influenced by the Bolivean, Peruvian and Chilean backgrounds of the bandmembers, Fortaleza's mountain music swelled into a colorful display of ultimately danceable pieces including the beautifully lyrical "Flight of the Condor," and the newer, irresistably African-influenced "Samba Rhumba." Once again we rose to our feet, danced and yelled for more.

SciFi convention correction

The science fiction convention, NOTJUSTANOTHERCON-5, will take place on Oct. 20-22 in all rooms of the campus center basement.

Until Oct. 1, tickets will be $10 for UMass students and $13 for the general public.

From Oct. 1-19, tickets will be $13 for UMass students and $15 for the general public.

Tickets may also be available for everybody at the door for a price of $17.

Mallett creates a romantic evening of love and memories

By AL KAUFMAN
Collegian Staff

David Mallett
Amherst College
Sunday, Sept. 24

"I'm one of those sentimental slobs who sits around and remembers how great the old days were," is how David Mallett introduced his song "You Can't Go Home Again." It was a fitting description of himself.

The bearded, self-assured singer — songwriter — guitarist came across as a hip Kenny Rogers Sunday night at Amherst College as he effortlesly sang about romance and memories of years gone by.

It was a night for lovers, young and old alike. Many sat with their arms around each other and smiled and hugged during songs such as "I Fall In Love For a Lifetime," "This Love Is Like a Red, Red Rose" and "Somewhere in Time," which Mallett introduced as a "metaphysical love song; a Shirley McLaine kind of thing."

Sure, you could have drowned a stack of pancakes with all the syrup he delivered, such as in "The Highways of My Heart," (On the highways of my heart/All signs lead to you"). But for some inexplicable reason, Mallett can get away with it. Sometimes, it's just nice to hear goop like that.

The same can be said about his voyages into the past. In "Back in My Sporting Days," a song he dedicated to "all the guys from my generation who knew all the words to 'Louie Louie,'" he looks back fondly on his carefree adolescent days, although he admits "I'd never go back down that road I took."

"My Old Man" was a touching tribute to his father. "He was there at the start with a willing heart/He was there when the world began." The song became a singalong, as did his biggest hit, which was covered by John Denver and Pete Seeger, "Inch By Inch." ("Inch by inch, row by row/I'm gonna make this garden grow")

The remainder of Mallett's songs dealt with hope and optimism. Songs like "Trouble You Are Messing With the Wrong Man" and "Come Out of the Blue" are, as he described of the later, "the kind of song that if you're having a rough day, you'll want someone to come up and sing it to you."

With David Meadow accompanying on the piano, all the songs had such a gentle ease about them that if you closed your eyes, you could almost picture yourself lounging on a white bearskin rug with that someone special before the flames of a brick fireplace.

It's all kind of hokey sounding, but that's the kind of evening it was. And in today's fast-paced, money-hungry, selfish world, hokey isn't all that bad.

10 minutes of any game," Hixon said. "That's how we started. It was our only chance so we wanted to take all of our risks early and see if we could make something happen right away."

And something did happen right away as senior forward Mara Fratassio scored her second goal of the game (her first was on Saturday to put UMass up 1-0) to put the Minutewomen up 2-1 in the first five minutes. Freshman Kathy Phelan was credited with an assist on the goal which turned out to be the game winner, for UMass, now 4-2.

"I thought overall this was one of our better games," Hixon said. "Considering we played well Saturday (a 2-1 loss in overtime to the No. 3 team in the nation, Providence College), we played even better today."

Sophomore forward Dawn Trumbauer added an insurance goal with about 10 minutes left in the game, to put the Minutewomen up 3-1 and Rutgers to the showers.

It was not a perfect game for UMass though. The Minutewomen controlled most of the first half but a little breathing room after the Trumbauer goal was a little too much reward.

"After we scored the third goal, we had a little bit of a lapse," Hixon said. "There was more play in the midfield."

But not near freshman goalie Phillipa Scott, who was finishing the game she started on Saturday. Scott was only forced to make one save off the Scarlet Knights. Rutgers could only draw one penalty corner.

The Minutewomen did not have as many lapses as they had been having though. And after Friday's loss to PC, a loss to Rutgers could have caused serious damage to the heads of the Minutewomen.

"Today's game really was important to us as far as just our own ranking in New England and just our own general feeling about ourselves and plus its our first Atlantic 10 game," Hixon said. "So we really needed to get out of the box and do something to get back on track to give ourselves a little confidence. Because I think we're playing well. Our opponents have just really capitalized on our errors which has been unfortunate. And we have not been able to create a lot. Today we did."

Those errors have not hurt the Minutewomen in the Atlantic 10 though. It can be considered a separate season and UMass is 1-0. That record will be changed for the better or for the worse this weekend when the Minutewomen travel to Penn State for two A-10 games, one with the Nittany Lions and one with St. Joseph's University.

Those two games may loom large in the success of this season, even it is not even the half way through.

The University of Massachusetts water polo team ran into troubled waters this past weekend as it took on three of the top 12 teams in the country at the National Invitational at Brown.

On Saturday, the Minutemen went down to defeat at the hands of No. 5 Stanford by a 21-5 score and the University of California-San Diego, ranked ninth, 16-1. On Sunday 12th ranked Arkansas-Little Rock swam away from UMass for a 15-5 victory.

UMass, ranked 16th coming into the weekend, was dealt a blow when coach Russ Yarworth was forced to skip the games due to an illness in his family.

"Those teams were real tough up there," UMass' Brian McIver said. "We did some things well, but not enough of them."

The Minutemen will get a chance to regain some of their pride next weekend when they hit the water in the National Invitational at Fordham.

Field hockey runs past Rutgers, 3-1

The University of Massachusetts field hockey team defeated Rutgers University at Totman Field yesterday.

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

What did the University of Massachusetts field hockey team have to do yesterday at 11 a.m. anyways besides go to classes? The Minutewomen might as well finish up the game that was halted at halftime Saturday because of a hurricane.

And that is exactly what they did. 35 minutes was all they had to play and that was all that the Minutewomen needed to settle the contest. Final score: UMass 3, Rutgers 1.

"It was kind of weird playing one half," Hixon said. "Very weird for both teams."

Add it to Saturday's chapter of the game though and it all adds up to a big victory in UMass' opening Atlantic 10 conference game.

The Minutewomen are the defending A-10 champions but an added bonus will go with that title this year. The team that wins the tourney at the end of the year after the regular season round robin will automatically be given a spot in the NCAA tournament.

The top four teams in the A-10 will go to its post season tourney sometime in early November. Yesterday's win was a small step in that direction.

The Minutewomen went into yesterday morning's game the same as any other game, tied. But the score was one to one and if the Minutewomen fell behind early, there would be less time than normal to rally back.

"We tried to really come out hard and play like the last

Minutewomen travel to Yale

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts field hockey team gets its first look at the Ivy League this year when the Minutewomen travel to Yale University today (3:30 p.m.) for a date with the Elis.

Yale may be a pesky team. The Elis are 1-3 but they have a goalie by the name of Sue Sabatino that is tough to crack.

"She's really outstanding," UMass coach Pam Hixon said. "She'll make a lot of saves. I think Yale is going to be young and a little inexperienced but Sue really makes the difference. If she gets hot, its tough."

Sabatino has made 45 saves and allowed eight goals in four games. She is the alternate goalie for the United States National Under-21 team.

Yale's win was a 4-0 shutout of Fairfield University. They Elis have not faired well in the Ivy League. After going 0-6 last year in the Ivy, the Yale is 0-2 this year, having lost by 2-0 scores to Brown and Harvard.

UMass is 4-2, 1-0 in the Atlantic 10 conference after yesterday's win over Rutgers. The Minutewomen will depend on senior midfielder Kathy DeAngelis, who has scored four goals this season, and Mara Fratassio, who had two goals against Rutgers to break Sabatino.

"We have to get to her (Sabatino) early so we take her momentum away if at all possible," Hixon said.

UMass' goalie situation is not so cut and dry though. Sophomore Lisa Charron started the opening game and beat Syracuse but gave up two goals.

Freshman Phillipa Scott who has received the nod from Hixon for the last five games would appear to have won the job but nothing really is a lock at this point.

"Their styles are very different," Hixon said. "The one thing about Scotty is she gets the ball away from the goal very quickly and that just takes a lot of pressure off the defense when you have a goalie that can do that."

Despite the amount of playing time, nobody is No. 1 yet.

Men's tennis takes ECAC tournament

By RICK SETO
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's tennis team won the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference North Tournament at Albany last weekend, with an excellent team effort and a clutch match by top singles player Barry Wadsworth.

The Minutemen won the 25-team tournament with 20 points, edging co-runner ups Tufts and Mercyhurst by a single point, and they couldn't have done it without Wadsworth.

Wadsworth, a transfer from Penn State, had the weight of a possible championship on his shoulders as coach Manny Roberts informed him at a most important time.

The No. 1 doubles team of senior Chris Johnson and freshman Lloyd Tietlebaum had beaten their Vermont counterparts in their respective flight. Meanwhile, Wadsworth was on another court also playing a Catamount in his flight's championship match.

Johnson and Tietlebaum's win set up a possible route for victory, which now totally rested on the last Minuteman on the courts — Wadsworth.

He had split the first two sets, losing 3-6 and winning 7-5. At the beginning of the third and final set, Wadsworth was informed of the new importance of his match.

"I told Barry that if he lost, we would be in a three-way tie for first," Roberts said. "And if he won, we would win the whole thing."

The sophomore from South Hadley had gone up 4-2, but lost some of his ground and fell into a 4-4 tie with his opponent from Vermont. The two battled to a tiebreaker, and when the dust cleared, Wadsworth won 7-4 and brought home the trophy.

Roberts said, "Barry's match was pivotal to the title, but I thought everybody else played well."

Those others who had a hand in the big win were No. 3 and 4 singles, Jeff Hechemy and Rich Stone. Each advanced into the round of 16 but lost in the quarterfinals. The No. 2 player, Paul Audet, was hampered by a back problem, and could only pick up a point for the team.

This is the first ECAC North victory for UMass during Roberts' seven-year reign as head coach, and according to him, it was the first since the Minutemen were in the Yankee Conference some twenty years ago.

"It's been a long time since UMass has won a big tourney like that," said Roberts. As far as the outlook for the rest of the season, the exuberant coach said, "With the guys coming off some intense tennis, they should be ready for anything."

Soccer teams battle New England rivals today

• Women travel to Rhode Island

By RICK SETO
Collegian Staff

On paper, the University of Rhode Island looks like a very weak team. The WRams have many freshmen and sophomores in their lineup, and they haven't been doing well. They are also winless, losing their first five games.

But UMass coach Jim Rudy isn't using the win-loss mark as an indicator of a feisty opponent and remembers a painful 1-0 loss earlier in the season.

"Shoot, I don't care," Rudy said. "Vermont hadn't won a game either. We're not taking anyone lightly."

The WRams have been playing freshmen and sophomores in their lineup, and that hasn't seemed to work. Rudy feels that URI has not been able to fill the void of one particular player.

"They are still trying to recover from the loss of their goaltender, Mellissa MacCall," said Rudy. "Last year she had 18 saves against us [in a 2-0 UM win] and was spectacular. Many of them bordered on miraculous.

"I think we'll have a nice style of play to deal with.

They're patient. What I like about them is that they try to play the game. They're not into knocking it up and trying to knock it in. They'll pass it around and support each other."

After five games, Massachusetts is relatively healthy. Sweeper Kim Montgomery is still icing her right ankle and midfielder Lisa Mickelson is having a nerve problem in her hip checked out by the doctor. Montgomery is probable for tomorrow's game (at URI, game time 4 p.m.) while Mickelson is questionable.

Freshman Skye Eddy will get the call in net from Rudy after Mary Curtis started against Hartford Thursday. Eddy (2-0) has given up only one goal in her two starts. "It's her turn," said Rudy. "We're pretty much alternating for the season."

The leading scorers for the Reds are juniors April Kater (2 goals, 3 assists, 7 points) and Sue Gaudette (2-1-5), and freshman Holly Hellmuth (2-1-5).

Kater and Gaudette came through to help break a close game in the rain at Hartford, and there's no telling what the duo can do on a dry surface. Hellmuth has a two-game scoring streak, scoring both times on cornerkicks from Colette Bowler (0-2-2). The defenseman's outstanding leaping ability makes a dangerous weapon close to the net.

Funny, but not too long ago, many of the so-called experts undercut UMass in the pre-season polls because of their losses to graduation.

By the way, the Reds are 4-2 and second in the New England Region. Not too bad for a team that can field a team with six young'uns and still whip most teams on the East Coast.

For the third consecutive game, the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team will be competing with a top-five team of New England. However, head coach Jeff Gettler doesn't seem too bothered. "It's great for us," said Gettler of today's game against Yale University at Upper Boyden Field at 3 p.m. "We're ready to get a good result."

Yale began their season with a 4-2 loss to Princeton. Senior forward Dave Goldblatt scored both goals for the game. He is currently the Eli's leading scorer.

Their second game ended in a 1-1 tie with Brown. Freshman forward Bill Donnell scored Yale's only goal of the game during his varsity debut.

Senior Bryan Martin will start for Yale today in the goal. Martin has allowed only three goals in four games this season and currently has 26 saves. Last year he was named Ivy League Honorable Mention, and claimed All-New England and Second-Team All-Ivy as a sophomore.

Eli players currently out due to injuries are Eric Cople and Von Hughs. Junior midfielder Cople was Second-Team All-Ivy and Honorable Mention All-League last year. Cople is experiencing knee problems. Junior forward Hughs was Yale's leading scorer last year and is currently sporting an ankle injury.

Freshman Steve Armenti will start in the goal today against Yale for his third consecutive collegiate game. Thus far, Armenti has had an impressive freshman season with 21 saves this season.

Some faces in the lineup have been changed, as well as positions, particularly in the midfield. Senior Evan Buxner will be starting his first home game this season at right back. Sophomore Tom Novajasky has been moved back from midfield to left back.

Sophomore Dan Lawrence has been moved up from back to play center midfield. Junior midfielder Pete McEvoy is still nursing an injured ankle. Sophomore Brett Anthony will control center midfield, flanked by classmate Darren Stone, moved up from back, and senior Louis Hollmeyer, moved back from forward.

Gettler felt these changes in position could only help the Minutemen against Yale. These changes may make the difference between holding-off a top-seed team and actually winning against a region contender.

"We need to win the midfield this game," said Gettler. "We need to give our forwards chances to get dangerous. If we can do that, we can score — and win."

SGA election results may not be ratified

'Confusion' & 'disorganization' cited

By NATHAN KRYSTALL
Collegian Staff

More than 80 students were elected Monday to the Undergraduate Student Senate, but Student Goverment Association officials said yesterday that procedural errors may force the SGA to nullify the results.

Student Speaker John Dunlap said he will not support the ratification, or approval, of the election results at tonight's senate meeting.

Election results must be approved by a majority of the senate before senators-elect are allowed to formally take office.

Dunlap said procedural errors during the elections include a lack of volunteers needed to staff ballot boxes, which resulted in late ballots to some areas.

He said the names of some candidates were misspelled or appeared twice in various areas and there was no slot for a write-in candidate on the Commuter Area ballot.

"I don't support the ratification of this election," Dunlap said. "There was a great deal of confusion and disorganization in the elections."

To nullify the elections, the senate must decide not to ratify the results by a majority vote, he said. A motion to approve the election results is on the agenda for the senate meeting.

But student Attorney General Robert Fadel said the results can only be called unfair if it is proven that there were improprieties that affected the outcome of the election.

Dunlap said the lack of volunteers to staff the elections resulted in the polls being set up late at the dining commons, which served as voting centers.

"Any senator that doesn't serve time staffing the ballot boxes has a serious lack of commitment to the democratic process," Dunlap said.

Sen. Bob Monaghan (Moore), who was re-elected, said his name appeared on the ballots of two different constituencies: Moore and Patterson residence halls.

"I'd like to see the election run again," said Monaghan, who is also president of the Southwest Area Government. "I don't think it's right to put someone's name under two buildings."

Despite the errors, Dunlap said it is likely the senate will ratify the results because the incumbent senators, many of whom were re-elected, will be unwilling to run for their seats again.

However, Paul DelGallo, who lost his bid for re-election as a Commuter Area senator, said he expects the senate to nullify the elections.

"There are a substantial number of people who are upset about the elections," DelGallo said. "From what I've heard they'll be appealed and overturned."

DelGallo said student elections have been the primary cause of conflict within the senate in the past.

"The majority of senate infighting results from elections," DelGallo said. "The SGA should run perfect or very near perfect elections."

"Whether it was an unfair election or not is up for those who lost to determine," Fadel said.

Ross Condit, who coordinated the election, said he does not think the elections need to be re-run but that he will support Dunlap's position against ratification.

"I would have liked to see it run differently," said Condit, who is also the SGA Governmental Affairs chairperson.

Condit said he is working on an amendment to the SGA constitution that will make the guidelines for future elections more specific.

Author: Collectivism hurts Blacks' self-esteem and success

By BRYAN HOUSE
Collegian Correspondent

Author and assistant professor Anne Wortham during a Smith College lecture Monday used her childhood experience of growing up in Jacksonville, Miss., during the 50s to reflect upon the problems of self-esteem and lack of individualism among Blacks.

"There are three misconceptions about Blacks," she said. "All Blacks are collectivist in orientation, all are programmed to vote Democratic, and they wouldn't be where they are today without Welfare."

Wortham, an assistant professor of sociology at Washington and Lee University and author of The Other Side of Racism, spoke about "Individualism: For Whites Only?" at Smith College's Seelye Hall.

Wortham said she believes that individualism is the key for Blacks to succeed in modern American society. However, individualism is most often attributed to Whites and has even been blamed in the Black community for the breakup of families, illegitimacy, and drug problems, leading Blacks to accept and follow African collectivist traditions.

However, Wortham said she does not believe Blacks can succeed by staying separate and collectivist. She said, 'That is not our way of life here, and we should not use those terms."

Wortham blamed low self-esteem among Black children as one of the main reasons Blacks are not as individualistic. "Self-esteem is a requirement of human survival and is a property of individualism," she stated.

In the 1950s, social scientists argued Black school children had self-esteem problems due to segregation, she said. However, Wortham attended a segregated school and said she does not agree with this philosophy, pointing out she also had "normal" problems and concerns: boys, studies, and moving around a lot.

The absence of White students as classmates did not affect her self-esteem, she added.

Wortham said she believes the problem of low self-esteem has many causes. Often it's due to guidance, or lack thereof, in the home. Also, education and history leave out much of the great achievements of Blacks, and other races, in American culture. Yet, Wortham does not believe the increasingly popular theory of Afro-centric curriculum is the answer to low self-esteem problems.

"It's one thing to know contributions of Blacks in our culture," she said, "But it is a questionable issue whether self-esteem is based and attained by such learning. The overall effect of learning will determine self-esteem, not separating the achievements of different groups, black, Chinese, European."

Town seeks excise tax from students

From The Associated Press

Town Finance Director Nancy Maglione says a proposal to force out-of-town students at Amherst's two colleges and the University of Massachusetts to pay their vehicle excise taxes to Amherst could raise up to $250,000 for the town.

But she called the scheme, schedules to be considered at next month's Town Meeting, an administrative nightmare. "I haven't the foggiest idea how we could get every student in town to comply," Maglione said Monday.

Vincent J. O'Connor, who sponsored the move with fellow town meeting member Jon Hite, said students, who now pay excise taxes to their hometowns, have 2,000 to 5,000 cars.

"Amherst is unique," he maintained. "You can't tell me another community has this level of out-of-town vehicles garaged here," he said, suggesting the town use college parking stickers to enforce the change.

Program cut 48 percent; director upset

By LISA MILLEGAN
Collegian Correspondent

The 48 percent cut this fall in the University Without Walls program will not affect the current commitments to its participants, according to the director.

But Gary Bernhardt, director of the UWW program, said he is still upset the program has received such a cut.

"This reveals an erosion of caring about non-traditional students," he said.

While the cuts this fall will not affect the UWW program, which has nearly 300 students currently enrolled, they will force program heads do some "thinking and planning about the future."

The non-traditional students who participate are usually people more than 34 years of age with full-time jobs and other commitments who would like to enhance their experiences, Bernhardt said.

The UWW, located in Montague House, has been serving students since 1971, by allowing them to combine college courses and life experience to obtain college degrees.

Sally Sonn, secretary and editorial assistant of the UMass chemistry department, said she has been involved with the program for three years.

"I like [the program] because it's structured for adults," she said. "The advisors realize that we have another life at home. We have demands made on us from work and kids. It's not like we can go home to a dorm or an apartment."

> "This reveals an erosion of caring about non-tradtional students."
> --UWW Director Gary Bernhart

Bernhardt said that under faculty supervision, UWW students construct requirements for their degrees, and those requirements cannot duplicate any existing UMass degree requirements. UWW requires that students include courses from several departments, and that they take three core courses: "Perspectives on Learning," "Writing About Experience," and "Degree of Element."

The UWW handbook said that through time, students compile a "prior learning portfolio, which consists of essays detailing fundamental themes and ideas that have emerged as a result of the student's experience."

Bernhardt said the students who participate in the program come from a variety of backgrounds.

He said one student had been a professional dancer for years and had taught college level courses with no previous degree before he entered the UWW program.

Another student, a 72-year-old man who is the director of a nursing home in New York, is currently pursuing a career in gerontology, the scientific study of the aging and their problems, he said.

People interested in UWW can contact Bernhardt at the program office in Montague House, or call at 545-0844.

Bernhardt said he feels that the UWW program is a "very rare and distinctive program in higher education," because of tremendous support provided by staff and peers throughout the students' participation in the program."

Administration wants input

By JULIE LIVINGSTONE
Collegian Correspondent

In these days of budget cuts, students may be wondering whether or not their concerns are being heard. An attempt to do so is being made by the administration, which is asking for letters in regard to the criticisms and praises of the General Education Program.

A sub-committee has been established for a review of the General Education program, Professor Kandula S.R. Sastry said yesterday.

Following requests from the Faculty Senate Rules Committee, Provost Richard O'Brien, and Chancellor Joseph Duffey, the Academic Matters Council has decided to investigate the effectiveness of the program. The council deals with extracurricular activities on campus.

Sastry, chairman of the sub-committee, said: "We are just beginning to address the problem. What we really want is to talk with lots of people, students and faculty, and see to what extent it has attained its goals. If there is a possibility of it having failed, we want letters as to ways it can be sustained and what are the problems."

According to Sastry, the entire committee will review the program. He had no direct comment as to possible changes. "I would prefer not to make premature statements," he said. "The time scale for review is rather short; it must be turned in by late this fall.

"We have not fully identified the problem. So," he stressed, "it is of vital importance that students write. We do like to hear from them, and about their problems."

Letters should be addressed to: Kandula Sastry, Chairman, AMC Sub-Committee on Review of Gen. Ed Program, Dept. of Physics and Astronomy, LGR Tower.

Child 'day' care not enough for parents

BOSTON (AP) — A sociologist studying work schedules and child care says more attention must be paid to problems of couples who parent and work in shifts — daddy working nights and parenting days, while mommy does the reverse.

"Unfortunately, I think we're not going to take this issue as seriously as we should," said University of Maryland sociologist Harriet Presser.

"The child care debate now is only touching the surface of the issues we have to look at," she told the Boston Globe in an interview published Tuesday.

"How can you get policy makers interested in the problems of nightcare and weekend care and relative care when we haven't solved the problem of taking care of child care during the day under the best of conditions?" she said.

In an article that is to appear in the journal Demography in November, Presser analyzed 1985 Census Bureau data and other research. Among her findings:

- One of every six working mothers with children younger than 14 works non-day hours or rotating shifts, as do one of five working fathers.
- Almost one-quarter of the mothers — and 30 percent of the fathers — usually work at least one weekend day.

Overall, Presser found, the proportion of preschool children cared for mainly by their fathers when their mothers work has remained constant — about 15 percent — for the past two decades. The actual number of fathers providing child care has grown as the number of working mothers has grown.

In 1985, for example, she said one fifth of preschool children in dual-earner families were cared for mainly by their fathers when their mothers worked. Many more fathers provided supplemental care.

"The question that needs to be looked at is the effect on those marriages," said psychologist Deborah Phillips of the University of Virginia. "Are they sacrificing the relationship they have as adults? And how does that affect children.?"

Wellesley College sociologist Rosanna Hertz used in-depth interviews to examine the impact of shift work on the families of male military security workers who rotated schedules every few days.

"There's a heavy price that husbands, wives and children are paying," Hertz said.

When the wives work, Hertz said, the men often care for the children.

However, she said, "We don't know what the quality of that care is. From my interviews, these men are catnapping on the couches. We're talking about being physically present."

Shift work is more common among single mothers than married mothers, Presser said.

She said one-sixth of married, employed mothers with children under 14 work non-day hours on rotating shifts.

She said 30 percent of single mothers work one or both weekend days, compared with 21 percent of married mothers.

Greeks' penny protest continues; Full-time director sought

By PAUL MORRIS
Collegian Staff

On the second day of their three-day campaign to call attention to the Greek Affairs staff shortage, fraternity and sorority members yesterday continued to donate pennies at the Dean of Students and the Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs offices.

Ed Korza, assistant dean of students, estimated they received another 50 pennies in addition to the estimated 75 collected yesterday.

"The students come in and say, 'I would like to make a contribution to the hiring budget,' and leave two cents on the counter," Korza said.

Melissa Silverstein, president of the Panhellenic Council and co-president of the Greek Area Government, said the Greek Area students want the administration to recognize that they need a full-time professional director.

"The directors are our support system," she said. "They help organize the area, supply contacts and are there to bounce program ideas off of."

A hiring freeze has blocked the filling of open positions, including assistant director, which became vacant this year.

Hilton bombed; two killed

BOGOTA, Columbia (AP) — The military imposed heavy security on the Caribbean tourist city of Cartagena today after another bomb blast blamed on drug traffickers killed two people and injured one at a Hilton hotel.

Two other bombs exploded Monday, injuring one other person.

Today, a Cabinet minister was to meet with representatives of the country's 4,600 judges in an effort to head off a strike in protest of what the judges call the government's failure to adequately protect them from drug gangs.

Colombian marines, army troops and national police patrolled Cartagena, searching cars at roadblocks and frisking pedestrians, said Col. Luis Herrera, chief of the national police in Cartegena.

The two who died at the hotel were Colombian doctors attending a medical convention, Herrera said.

Authorities presume drug traffickers are behind 110 bombings that have killed eight people and injured 132 since President Virgilio Barco's declared war on Colombia's powerful cocaine cartels on Aug. 18, following the assassination of a leading presidential candidate.

The hotel bomb and another that exploded at a Cartagena bank Monday were the first bombings in that city since the drug war began. One person was injured by the bomb Monday night at the bank, Herrera said.

A third bomb exploded Monday night in Bogota at a government electric company's billing office, the national police said. No injuries were reported.

Many of the bombings since mid-August have been against government-owned banks and utilities. The majority owner of the Cartagena Hilton is the Colombian government's National Tourism Council.

Thousands of U.S., Canadian and other foreign tourists visit Cartagens and its beaches each year. The city also is a regular stop for Caribbean cruise ships.

Communists kill two Americans

MANILA, Philippines (AP) — Suspected Communist rebels today killed two Americans near a U.S. military base shortly before Vice President Dan Quayle arrived for a three-day visit, Filipino officials said.

Six unidentified gunmen firing from a passenger jeep killed the pair at about 5 p.m. in Capas, about 60 miles north of Manila, said Col. Florentino Amorabon, spokesman for the Philippine Constabulary in central Luzon.

Amorabon said the two were civilian employees of Clark Air Base, a U.S.-run facility 50 miles north of Manila. The military believes the assailants were Communist rebels, who operate in the Clark area, Amorabon said.

In April, rebels killed U.S. Army Col. James Rowe as he was driving to the headquarters of the U.S. Joint Military Assistance Group in Quezon City.

Also today, suspected Communist rebels killed a captain from President Corazon Aquino's guard force in an ambush about one mile southeast of where the president will hold talks with Quayle on Wednesday.

Bigoted landlord?

The law is on the renter's side in the battle against housing discrimination

By COSMO MACERO JR.
Collegian Staff

As most students will attest, the quest for suitable housing in and around Amherst requires time, patience and a bit of luck. For some, the search may produce nothing but a series of application rejections, waiting lists and unreturned phone calls. The situation can become even more frustrating for a potential renter victimized by housing discrimination.

Thomas Coish, an attorney specializing in tenants' rights at the University of Massachusetts Legal Services, points out that it is illegal in Massachusetts for a landlord to refuse rental without valid reason.

> "The economic incentive for landlords to be fair is missing. If they don't want to be fair, they're still not going to lose any money."
> – Attorney Thomas Coish

"Essentially, there is a statute in this state that makes it illegal to deny anybody access to what is considered public accommodations based on unreasonable criteria," Coish said.

The statute was originally passed in the 1950s to provide for the integration of lunch counters, bathrooms and other segregated facilities, he said.

"[Segregation] wasn't as much of a problem in this part of the country, but Massachusetts passed a law making it illegal anyway," he said.

While originally the law was unclear as to whether it applied to rental housing, Coish said a decision by the Boston Housing Court interpreted the statute as meaning any arbitrary or irrational denial of rental housing was illegal.

Apart from the public accommodations statute, the state housing discrimination law defines specific criteria that cannot be used in the interviewing of potential tenants.

"You cannot discriminate on the basis of race, national origin, religion or sex. In addition, families with children and recipients of public assistance (housing subsidies) are protected under this law," he said.

People who feel they have been denied housing unfairly because of other reasons (sexual orientation, status as an undergraduate or graduate student, etc.) would do best to take action under the public accommodations statute, he said.

"I think based on the public accommodations decision, it's very likely a court would find an instance of discrimination based on the fact you're a student, or you may be gay or lesbian, or for other reasons," Coish said.

Debbie Beaulieu runs Progressive Property Management, an independent realty service. Beaulieu is sensitive to the fact that many landlords are apprehensive about renting to students because of the potential for property damage.

"There are certain landlords that won't rent to undergraduates based on damage costs they have incurred in the past," Beaulieu said. "Some students will use their security deposit as the last month's rent, and any damages to the property end up being paid for by the owner or the realtor," she said.

The primary criteria a landlord uses for selecting tenants are tenant history (Did they pay their rent on time? Did they damage property? Did they break the lease?), and financial status (Can they pay the rent now?), Beaulieu said.

"A while back I had three Black women call me because they liked the name of the company (Progressive Property Management)," she said. "They said, 'We hope you really are progressive, because we've been turned down at several places.'"

The three women felt they had been treated unfairly because they were denied housing in spite of their excellent references. Bealieu found them an apartment in Northampton.

"These women had run into problems looking for a place to live," she said. "Their references were fine, so I found them a place, which was to my benefit, because they were and still are excellent tenants.

The housing market in Amherst is a tight one. A massive population of students, professionals and young families provides a constant source of clientele for local property owners and managers. It is this attractive market that can lead to unfair selection procedures and discrimination, said Legal Services attorney Coish.

"The economic incentive for landlords [in Amherst] to be fair is missing," Coish said. "If they don't want to be fair, they're still not going to lose any money."

"If there was a 5 percent vacancy rate . . . landlords wouldn't be able to just turn down a reasonable tenant based on whatever criteria, or else they might be sitting there with a vacant building," he said. "In a housing market like this one, they can discriminate against somebody, and be pretty sure that someone else is going to come along."

During fiscal year 1989 (July '88 - June '89), 85 reports of housing discrimination in western Massachusetts were filed with the Springfield branch of the Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination, according to Terry Morris, a representative from the MCAD in Boston. (Figures for Amherst were not available.)

Coish generally advises those who believe they have been discriminated against on any grounds to contact the MCAD in Springfield, or to file a grievance with the local Fair Housing Committee.

Students or families who are financially stable and have a good tenant history should be considered qualified to apply for residence in a complex like Salem Place on Main Street.

Joanne Levinson is chairperson of the Fair Housing Committee, and runs the Off-Campus Housing Office in the Student Union Building. She said most renters are unfamiliar with housing discrimination laws, and while some may think they've been given the runaround, they're usually unaware that a housing statute may have been violated.

"People who are referred to this office might come in feeling like they've been treated unfairly or exploited, but not necessarily like they've been discriminated against," Levinson said. "If they want to pursue a grievance, they can file a complaint with the MCAD through our office."

While racial discrimination is most often associated with urban housing woes, Coish said the situation in Amherst differs in that the most evident forms of discrimination affect single parents with children, and renters on government subsidy programs.

"I don't think race discrimination is quite as pronounced here as it is in Boston, but it does go on," he said.

"Most of the complaints we get are from people who are being turned down because they receive rent subsidies, or because they have children."

Coish said the most desirable tenants are graduate students and professionals but that landlords have different biases.

"Tenants in demand are . . . preferably without children, preferably straight, preferably White . . . and to some extent, I've seen a pattern with some landlords in town who rent almost exclusively to women," he said.

"This is based on perceived stereotypes of men being more rowdy, less caring of the property and things like that," he added.

Coish said that it is obviously unlikely that you would find landlords or property managers that say they discriminate on the basis of race or gender.

Any unfairness or inequality in the selection process is most likely carried out in a more subtle manner, he said.

Those who have been victims of housing discrimination, and have been angered enough to take action, may seek counseling from advisors they know and trust before approaching a state organization like the MCAD.

Sherwood Thompson is director of Third World Affairs, and a staff assistant for Student Activities. He said that when a student approaches him with a complaint, he assesses the situation, and refers the person to Legal Services or Off-Campus Housing.

"I am aware that there are people challenging local property managers and landlords, and my best course of action is to refer them to the appropriate organization," he said. "I am a Notary Public, and I have notarized grievances against landlords in this town."

Coish feels that residents of Amherst should re-evaluate what appears to be a favorable housing situation.

"People ought to realize that there is a lot of subtle discrimination in this town, which is supposed to be a progressive community . . . but this is going on, particularly in the housing field, and people should be sensitive to that."

Study: 'Alarming' drug use in Jr. high schools

WASHINGTON (AP) — Some sixth-graders say they use cocaine as often as every week, according to a survey released today that shows an "alarming trend" of drug use among junior high school students.

At the same time, illicit use of drugs and alcohol declined among high school students, according to the non-scientific survey of almost 400,000 secondary school students by the National Parents' Resource Institute for Drug Education.

"Whereas we have seen some drugs (in drug use) at the upper grades, at the lower grades there is an alarming trend of more use," said Doug Hall, vice president of PRIDE.

Dr. Thomas J. Gleaton, Jr., president of the Atlanta-based drug prevention organization that has been conducting the nationwide surveys since 1982, said that the study "detected weekly cocaine use in the sixth grade."

Of the 29,116 sixth graders who responded to the question about cocaine use, about 233 said they used cocaine weekly or daily, according to the report. About 58 sixth graders said they used cocaine once or twice a month, and another 87 sixth graders said they used cocaine one to six times a year, the survey found.

The survey covered 392,003 students in grades 6 to 12 who answered the anonymous questionnaire given in 956 schools in 38 states, according to PRIDE.

Overall for junior high students, of the 161,907 who responded to the question on cocaine use, 0.7 percent or 1,133 said they used it weekly or daily, an equal number used it infrequently and 648 said they used it once or twice a month.

The study showed 24.9 percent of junior high school students said they had drunk an alcoholic beverage this year. Two years ago 26.3 percent said they had done so, and in 1984-85 21.2 percent said they had.

In senior high school grades 9-12, the use of cocaine, marijuana, beer, and liquor declined from the levels of two and four years ago, the study found.

A total of 4.6 percent of the 223,036 students in grades 9-12 who responded to the question on cocaine use said they used the drug this year, compared with 5.7 percent four years ago and 6.4 percent two years ago, the PRIDE survey found. Of the 10,360 this year who said they used cocaine, 2,900 said they used it weekly or daily, according to the report.

The National High School Seniors Survey, released in February, also found that drug abuse among high school seniors declined last year, reaching its lowest level since 1975.

Extrapolating from the survey, PRIDE estimated that 690,000 American students in grades 6-12 tried cocaine last year and about 223,000 used cocaine weekly or daily. PRIDE did not provide a margin of error for the estimate, however.

Gay rights bill progresses

BOSTON (AP) — A gay rights bill to outlaw discrimination in housing, employment, credit and public accommodations has cleared a parliamentary hurdle in the Massachusetts Senate and is eligible for floor action.

Senate President William Bulger, D-Boston, announced Monday the measure would be released today from a procedural panel, the Committee on Bills in the Third Reading, that has been holding it since July.

The House-passed measure won initial Senate approval in July on a 24-15 vote.

The bill, which has been considered by the legislature for the last 17 years, was then automatically sent to the procedural panel, which had not acted on it.

Sen. Michael J. Darrett, D-Cambridge, had asked the Senate to force the committee to discharge the bill, a move that would have required a simple majority vote to prevail.

David LaFontaine of the Coalition for Lesbian and Gay Rights said, "I think there has been an extraordinary change in atmosphere comparing 1987 to 1989."

LaFontaine said the bill stayed bottled up in the committee two years ago, and never made it to the Senate floor for a vote. majority rule," he said.

Crane says he won't run for state treasurer again; race now 'in high gear'

BOSTON (AP) — State Treasurer Robert Q. Crane announced yesterday he will not run for re-election to the job he has held for the last 25 years, but will not resign early, a move that would have allowed the Legislature to fill the job.

Crane's announcement ended weeks of speculation over the political future of the veteran official, who was voted in as treasurer by the Legislature in 1964 to fill the vacancy created when John Driscoll resigned to become chairman of the Massachusetts Turnpike Authority.

Referring to a popular Kenny Rogers song about a gambler who "knows when to hold them, knows when to fold them and knows when to walk away," Crane said, "Today it is time for me to walk away. I am not going to run away. I am going to walk slowly in the next 16 months. I will not and am not going to be a candidate for re-election in 1990."

Crane, 63, said his decision was based on his desire to spend more time with his family. Crane is married and has five children.

Crane said he intended to work hard for the remaining months of his term to help the state regain its financial footing.

Crane has been the subject of a number of charges and investigations over the years, but has always emerged relatively unscathed and never has failed to win re-election.

Most recently, he has come under scrutiny for his handling of a management contract for the state employees deferred compensation plan, which he renewed last week with a private firm with financial ties to former state Attorney General Edward McCormack.

But he said that controversy played no role in his decision.

"The decision I made had to do with my personal life, my private life and the fact I can do very well in the private sector," Crane said.

Crane has been a consultant for Market Enterprises, a food conglomerate, and said he expects to work for them full time after his term ends.

His official announcement sets the race for his post into high gear, with House Speaker George Keverian leading the pack, and also sets the stage for the election in 1991 of Rep. Charles Flaherty, D-Cambridge, as the next House Speaker.

Flaherty is now the majority leader.

Keverian cannot run for treasurer and for his House seat at the same time, so a Keverian run for treasurer would guarantee a shakeup in the House leadership.

In addition to Keverian, Rep. William Galvin, D-Boston, and Sen. Richard Kraus, D-Arlington, have expressed an interest in the Democratic nomination.

Joe Malone, the unsuccessful Republican challenger to Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., is expected to seek that party's nomination.

Crane said he did not expect to endorse anyone before the primary and emphatically said he would not step down to let the Legislature appoint someone, probably Keverian, to fill the vacancy.

"I will not resign from this office," Crane said. Asked if there was any chance he would change his mind, Crane said, "Are you talking about my death?"

In addition to managing all the state's cash and employee pension funds, the treasurer also serves as chairman of the Massachusetts Lottery Commission and the Massachusetts Convention Center Authority.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted.

Any ethnic joke will perpetuate negative prejudice

SAND-NIGGER. FAGGOT. SPIC. SPOOK. GOOK. DYKE. KIKE.

I hope I have offended you all. Social activists often criticize the use of these terms by high-profile hate groups. Yet, they remain silent on similar material repackaged as humor and sold in book stores.

A rash of repulsive joke books have carved a successful niche in the paperback industry. Feeding off a vocabulary of ethnic slurs, publishers have found prejudice to be profitable.

Flipping through two of the more popular titles of this hate genre — Truly Tasteless Jokes and Utterly Gross Jokes — makes it clear that no individual is immune to attack. People of every imaginable background are victimized in print. Some groups, however, are more favorite targets than others. What messages are being peddled as harmless jokes? Let's take a look:

● Asian physical characteristics are ridiculed; their eyes are "coinslots" or "slits." Eastern culture and language are dismissed as primitive. Kaffiyeh-wearing Arabs, for example, are labeled "rag-heads" or "towel-heads." Following this mentality, starvation and overcrowding are painted as forms of pleasure in destitute, underdeveloped countries.

"What is the most profitable use of an extra closet?
— Rent it to a Vietnamese family."

● Blacks are portrayed as lazy, stupid jungle creatures not worthy of an education. Why else would so many of them be on welfare? Most are watermelon-chomping drug dealers who live in high crime neighborhoods and absolutely cannot be trusted. African heritage, the history of slavery and the Ethiopian famine are all one big joke.

"What is the difference between a Black and a bicycle?
— A bicycle doesn't sing 'Kumbaya, my Lord' when you chain it to a wall."

"How do you make a perfect Manhattan?
— Move Union Carbide to Harlem."

Darren Garnick

● Hispanics all carry knives and will kill you for your hubcaps. Likewise, Puerto Ricans are viewed as greasy welfare-leeches who choose to live under filthy conditions. Since they offer no positive contribution to society, American neighborhoods would be better off without them.

"What's the definition of a crying shame?
— A Puerto Rican school bus going over a cliff with four empty seats."

● Jews are power-hungry lawyers, doctors and accountants obsessed only with money. "Jew" is sometimes used as a verb that means to cheat someone out of something.

"Why did the Jew cross the road?
— to franchise the other side."

● Homosexuals are blamed for starting AIDS and spreading it deliberately. Victims are the punchline of jokes.

"What does GAY stand for?
— Got AIDS Yet?"

Although each ethnic or social group has been branded with different derogatory stereotypes, the dehumanizing message is essentially the same. This expression of hatred through "humor"is not restricted to books. The books merely reflect deeply ingrained prejudices in our society.

WHAT'S SO FUNNY?

Why is gassing Blacks in Harlem, with the help of Union Carbide, a joke? Why is no one outraged at the suggestion that the more dead Puerto Ricans, the better?

If you are sick of hearing queries like "How many Ethiopians can fit into a blender?" then confront the joketeller. Tell him or her that you consider the "joke" offensive.

And don't buy the books. Repulsive joke books are nothing more than scrapbooks of hatred, something we need not preserve for future generations.

Cambodia's trail of tears should not be recurring

As the last Vietnamese soldier leaves Cambodia on Sept. 26, a pall of impending strife and desperation blankets the country.

Since Christmas 1978, as many as 200,000 Vietnamese soldiers have been stationed in Cambodia, relegating the reviled Khmer Rouge to border camps in Thailand.

The Vietnamese army has served to deliver the Cambodian people from the hell of 1975-79, when between one and two million people died under the vile regime of the Khmer Rouge leader, Pol Pot.

Jason George

Right now in this period of tentative calm in the eye of the impending storm, Cambodia's leaders maintain that their military is sufficiently strong to prevent a recurrence of the Khmer Rouge nightmare.

The Vietnamese-backed Prime Minister, Hun Sen, says that when the Vietnamese occupation ends, "Then you will see the strength of the Cambodian army."

If the Cambodian army is so strong, why is the government conducting a mass campaign of conscription? Why do soldiers enter discos and other public places to force people into an ad hoc army?

This does not indicate a military ready to resist the efforts of 30,000 Khmer Rouge soldiers.

This summer I met with a number of Cambodians at the college I worked at. One named Sali became a good friend. We talked about what was happening in his country.

He told me of how he hoped for peace so he could return home. "It is much simpler there. If you want to build a house, you cut down trees and you build it. If you are hungry, you can hunt or grow what you want."

His love for Cambodia ran deep, transcending much of the pain and anguish he suffered there. He lived through the days of Pol Pot, working 15 hours a day under the deadly stare of armed guards. He spend three years in concentration camps before escaping to Thailand and then to the United States. But in spite of the pain he experienced, Sali remembered the earlier times when he lived on a farm with his family. He talked of living in a land of plenty and of the simple contentment in which he spent his early days.

As the summer wore on, the failure of the peace negotiations in Paris to achieve a workable settlement became more obvious. It hurt me deeply to talk to Sali with the realization that peace in his time was a very distant prospect. He rarely showed how much this bothered him, smiling even when he spoke of things which must have caused him much pain.

Now, as the Vietnamese soldiers conclude their homeward exodus, evil stirrings are already beginning.

The Khmer Rouge have begun intensive artillery attacks on the area of Pailin in western Cambodia. They are mobilizing their troops for further action.

Cambodia must not be re-immersed into the hell fire which burned through the country for four long years.

We must hope that the light of international compassion is strong enough to cast away the darkness and barbarism of the past.

Once is far more than enough.

Congatulations Chancellor for supporting UMass

Let me be the first to congratulate UMass Chancellor Joseph Duffey for taking an innovative stand on University funding. When Edward Lashman, the state secretary of administration and finance, sent a memo last week requesting a plan to take another five percent out of the already hopelessly inadequate budget, Chancellor Duffey just said no.

Al Arpad

Maybe somebody else has congratulated him already, but they probably didn't do it in public. This is Massachusetts, and Chancellor Duffey has taken a daring and politically risky position. Most likely, his potential replacements all over the Northeast are dusting off their resumes in anticipation of the brief and ugly process by which the ruling Democratic party stifles intelligent dissent.

The call for Chancellor Duffey's resignation could come quietly from the Board of Regents of Higher Education, all of whom were appointed by Gov. Dukakis. Or, it could come quietly from the University Board of Trustees, all of whom were appointed by Gov. Dukakis.

Or it could come somewhat less quietly from the University faculty and administration, most of whom are simply conditioned to the political realities of the statewide Democratic machine.

Today's political reality calls for widespread lip reading, followed by profoundly satisfying damage to public institutions as our colossally stupid tax structure collapses around us.

Of course, political reality is pretty bleak all around as it is. In Monday's Boston Globe, a pair of fashionably astute political analysts described the imminent demise of the entire national Democratic party in the same terms as have become common since Gov. Dukakis blew his apparently presidential 17 point lead in the summer of 1988. Nothing new there.

But on the same day, the Springfield Union-News ran an editorial by the pleasantly discerning Charles Krauthammer. He claims that the postwar conservative coalition is inevitably crumbling, leaving the Republicans in dire straits of their own.

How can both parties orchestrate such a simultaneous decline?

Simple, says arch-conservative George Will, in a column carried by both papers: liberals and conservatives are both in business primarily for the benefit of a greedy middle class, and pitching to the bourgeoisie does not necessarily solve larger social problems.

When George Will finds himself in substantial agreement with Karl Marx, he is usually right. Both political parties across the country and in the Commonwealth are literally and ideologically bankrupt.

Here in Massachusetts in the wretched depths of the late 1980's, we are preparing for a gubernatorial race in which every single contender from either party is running against the legacy of the irrelevant, lame duck incumbent, just because he is the easiest target on the political horizon. The legislature is, simply and succinctly, even worse.

But even though the complete absence of courage, intelligence and foresight throughout the Massachusetts political arena might seem discouraging, it does present some opportunities.

It doesn't show on the surface.

Most students here have never experienced anything like political leadership before, but then, neither has the legislature.

If Chancellor Duffey knows what he is doing, and if the University constituency can forgive him the past several years of ignominious capitulation, we could see a new surge of political activity unrestrained by the moribund political realities of the 1980's.

UMass fans sloppier than visitors

As a former New Englander, I was invited last weekend by some University of Massachusetts alumni to attend the football game at Lehigh University. I enjoyed watching UMass soundly rout their opponents, and cheered their victory. As the game ended and the team triumphantly walked off the field, I was very disappointed. The UMass fans were left to view a disgusting mound of litter strewn from one end of their team's bench to the other — hundreds of cups thrown on the ground, in spite of the availability of garbage receptacles. The opponent's side of the field was clean.

I was embarrassed that a visiting New England team would create such a mess for their hosts, and leave their fans with such an unsavory sight. If UMass is classy enough to play in the Colonial League, they need to clean up their act.

Wortham contends that is is erroneous to believe one's self-esteem is determined by one's race.

According to Wortham, the best tools to end oppression and racism are self-reliance and education. Learning is the key to upsetting ignorance and invalid ideas and leads people to become more powerful individuals, she said.

"To many Americans, individualism is a myth accomplished by historic men of another time . . . Americans think individualism is a luxury we cannot afford," she said. "It is not a luxury but an essential lifeline and if we, especially minorities, do not claim the right to expression of individualism, we will endanger our freedom."

Wortham was born in Jacksonville, Miss. in 1941. In addition to being an assistant professor of sociology, she is working on a book about the problems of individualism and Blacks. She received a doctorate in sociology from Boston College in 1982. She has worked as a free lance writer in New York City and has contributed to Esquire, NBC, and ABC.

Germ Warfare Research Exposed As a Plan for War, Not Peace

Under a headline "GET THE PENTAGON OUT OF BIOLOGICAL WARFARE," The New York Times on Sept. 19, 1989, reproduced the letter below by David Keppel of Essex, Conn. Keppel is finishing a book on new ways of thinking about science and politics, is a former member of SANE/Freeze Strategy Commitee, and is a member of the advisory board of the Committee for Responsible Genetics.

The letter is printed here as a public service by the Western Mass. office of the Americaqn Friends Service Committee. The AFSC initiated last spring's campaign to stop UMass biological warfare research. The campaign was given support among students and faculty at UMass and nearby colleges and then nationally.

"To the Editor"

"In 'Lethal Weapons of Life Savers?' (editorial, Aug. 29), you offer welcome support for overdue legislation to implement the 1972 Biological Weapons Convention, but fail to discuss the main issue: this country's own biological-weapons program.

"Despite President Nixon's renunciation of biological weapons in 1969 and our ratification of the Biological Weapons Convention, the revolution in biotechnology has lured the military back. Since the beginning of the Reagan Administration, funds for biological-weapons research have grown more than fourfold to over $60 million.

"The Pentagon justifies its biological-weapons program by allegations about other countries and the claim that our program is strictly defensive. Both arguments are fallacies.

"A biological weapons program, with or without genetic engineering,cannot be truly defensive. Biological diversity is astronomical. We can no more develop a genetically engineered defense against an enemy's pathogen, whose specific characteristics we do not know, than guess a single telephone number in the New York exchange. The only value of biological defenses is use with our own germ weapons. Biological "defense" is a shield to be used with a sword: to protect the troops of the attacker.

"Equally fallacious is the ominous warning -- routinely leaked from secret briefings -- that biological weapons in the hands of terrorists are inevitable and only a "deterrent" can protect us. But development of biological weapons requires years of work by a large group of highly trained scientists with access to modern technology in genetic engineering, as Prof. Jonathan King of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology told the Senate Government Affairs Committee last May. He added: "The danger from terrorists is not their development of biological weapons, but rather a raid on such a facility. Therefore protection from terrorism lies in the direction of strengthening the treaty and prohibiting the establishment of biological research for military purposes."

"This is therefore the time to halt military involvement in genetic engineering. Congress should pass not only the Biological Weapons Convention bill, but also the biological defense oversight bill offered by Representative Wayne Owens of Utah, to transfer all medical aspects of biological defense from the military to the National Institutes of Health. Only when Biological research is conducted under civilian, not military, auspices will objective observers, including foreign governments, believe the United States is truly committed to the Biological Weapons Convention.

"We who are burdened with the responsibility of controlling and eliminating nuclear weapons must not repeat that tragic error with biological weapons."

Rourke and Lloyd to be stars of Fall

By GEORGE LENTZ
Collegian Correspondent

In this week's Screening Room we're going to take some time off from reviewing films to present some previews of the films that will be opening up in the area later this week. In addition, we'll be taking a brief look at some of the highlights of the Hollywood fall lineup.

Opening Friday is Walter Hill's Johnny Handsome starring Mickey Rourke and Ellen Barkin. Set in the steamy back alleys of New Orleans, the story follows John Sedley (Rourke), a low-life criminal born with a deformed face. After being paroled, Johnny is torn between getting his revenge or leading the law-abiding life reconstructive surgery has allowed.

Hill, a veteran of the action genre, says he was drawn to the project because it reminded him of "...a film noir, the kind of hard-edged picture I've always liked." Hill specifically chose the New Orleans setting because of its Gothic-quality. "The kind of place where you can believe anything is possible," he says.

Rourke, who filmed Angel Heart in New Orleans, was primarily attracted to the project because of Hill's involvement. "Walter expected a certain creativity from the actors he chose for this project," says Rourke. "I choose the roles that have the most conflict, roles I can take my own everyday experiences and use them to create the character, which is what I did with Johnny Handsome." Rourke spent hours mastering Johnny's speech impediment from a cleft palate and harelip with help from a speech pathologist.

If Hill can hit the stride he had with The WarriorsOr and if Rourke can regain some of the spark he had in some of his earlier films, Johnny Handsome could become tne suprise hit of the season.

Expectations are high for Norman Jewison's In Country starring Bruce Willis and Emily Lloyd. In Country is the portrait of one family's struggle to heal the wounds caused by Vietnam. Sam (Lloyd) desperately wants to know about the father she never knew, but no one is willing to talk to her about him or the war. She eventually finds her uncle Emmett (Willis), a ravaged survivor of the war who fought alongside her father. By coaxing her uncle to reveal the suffering buried in his own past, she hopes to breathe new life into all of their futures.

"In Country deals with the people left behind," says Jewison. "I hope this film and others like it can help heal that wound.'

Bruce Willis has put his acting talent to the test with In Country. "Emmett is a man who has a very tenuous grasp on life," says Willis. "He's just holding on for dear life. I think the worth of this film will be ultimately judged by our accurate portryal of the pain these men suffered. Our film deals with that healing process." In Country is scheduled for release Friday.

Among some of the other films worth mentioning is Drugstore Cowboy, a small low-budget film starring Matt Dillon and Kelly Lynch as a couple of junkies who exist solely to feed their habit. Dillon, who's career has sputtered like a wet bottle rocket, has been on the comeback trail. One Hollywood insider who has already seen the film, claimed, "The kid can act. I mean really act."

The Two Jakes, the long-awaited sequel to Roman Polanski's Chinatown, has finally been completed. Scripted by Robert Towne and directed by and starring Jack Nicholson,The Two Jakes is expected in late November.

Always, starring Richard Dreyfuss and Holly Hunter is a remake of A Guy Named Joe. The film concerns a love triangle involving two fighter pilots, one of whom is a spirit. Steven Spielberg makes a return to directing after the dismal Empire Of The Sun.Always is expected for a late November release with high expectations of Spielberg finally winning an Oscar.

And finally, no fall season would be complete without its slew of low-grade horror films to infiltrate theaters around Halloween. Leatherface: The Texas Chainsaw Massacre 3, Stepfather II, The Toxic Avenger 3: The Last Temptation OF Toxie and, as you may of guessed, Halloween 5: The Revenge of Michael Myers, are all ready to pilfer your hard earned dollars at the box office in the coming months.

Soviet girls chorus to perform in the spirit of Glasnost

The spirit of Glasnost will be singing throughout the area. "Yenisejuska," a Soviet girls chorus will be performing two concers in Amherst. They will perform at 7:30 p.m. Thursday, at the Amherst Regional Junior High School and at 3:30 p.m. Friday in Bezanson Recital Hall.

Richard du Bois, the director of the University Chorale, helped in arranging Yenisejuska's trip here. du Bois is associated with the "Friendship Ambassadors Foundation," a group that works to bring Soviet groups to the U.S. and vice versa. Yenisejuska is the group that is sponsoring the University Chorale's Soviet tour during May of 1990.

Yenisejuska hails form the Siberian city of Krasnoyarsk. The 16 girls who make up the ensemble range between the ages of 14 and 18. They have been training their voices since a very young age under the "Pioneer Palace" in Siberia.

A wide variety of traditional choral pieces will be performed. The repertoire includes works by Rimsky-Korsakov and Bach. Amherst is Yenisejuska's first performance on their U.S. tour. Other stops include Pennsylvania, New York City, and Washington D.C.

The girls will be staying in private homes in the different areas, thus enhancing their views on American lifestyle. Sight-seeing between the performances is scheduled

The public is cordially invited to attend each of these free performances. Further information may be acquired by calling the Department of Music and Dance at 545-2227.

Brides play with fire Crowd gets satisfaction

Blushing Brides
Katina's
Sunday, Sept. 24

You really can't always get what you want, but for the crowd of 200 that showed up at Katina's on Sunday night, they got what they needed, in the form of 90 minutes of rock 'n' roll.

The Blushing Brides have been covering Rolling Stones material for over 10 years. Although there have been many changes in personnel, their business remains the same — to play the greatest music of all time, and to play it well.

The act started on time (the Rolling Stones are notorious for being late.), and it immediately turned into the "Mick and Keith" show.

Maurice Raymond transformed into Mick Jagger, while Paul Martin maintained the likeness of Keith Richards for the next hour-and-a-half. It was obvious that there was something visually wrong with the left side of the stage. After tearing through "Bitch," "Respectable," and "Beast of Burden," Raymond finally let the crowd in on how Pierre Major, the group's Ron Wood, was laid-up with a "temperature of 118," and local friend David Brooks was called in to take over the lead guitar spot. Brooks (lead vocalist of the band In the Flesh), played incredibly well for someone who hasn't picked up a guitar in almost a year!

One of the highlights of the evening was the 15-minute version of "Midnight Rambler" in which Raymond proved beyond doubt that he can duplicate the mannerisms of Jagger onstage.

While "Mick" was doing his hand-on-hip strutting and monkey-lipped facial expressions, Martin was grinding out the rhythm with his guitar hung low, and the ever-present cigarette dangling from his mouth.

The good thing about this "Keith," is that he doesn't need a blood transfusion every few weeks.

The lead guitar was turned over to Gary Silver, a friend visiting from New York, as they went into "Honkey Tonk Woman" and "Brown Sugar." Bassist Vic Caffif and drummer Jack Fuller kept the beat solid and danceable throughout the set.

For the encores, Brooks returned, and the band played "Mixed Emotions," off the Stones new Steel Wheel album, along with a very long version of "Jumpin' Jack Flash."

The Blushing Brides were somewhat original in that none of the songs they played were duplicates of Stones studio versions. The tempo was picked up frequently, which added to the energy level the band puts out. If you go to see this band (they'll definitely be back), just squint your eyes a little and you'll never know the difference between this cover band, and the greatest rock 'n' roll band ever.

Opening for the Blushing Brides for the fourth time on this tour was Curtis T and the Kick, a hard driving, three-man blues band that's been playing mostly in New York City for the past two years. This band is sure to be playing locally in the near future.

Africa must unite, music helps

Collegian Correspondent

Fela Anikulapo-Kuti
Monday, Sept.25

On Monday night, instead of watching football, you should have been down at Pearl Street in Northampton to groove with a political dissident. It was much more interesting than Al Michaels.

The dissident in question was Fela Anikulapo Kuti, a man whose convictions and morality shine through in his music. He sings of the chains of oppression and of uprooting the system. He has been there and back, and he wants us to feel the outrage.

The music itself is between funk and a hard place. James Brown meets Malcom X, meets traditional Nigerian music, meets John Coltrane. The man, Kuti, is so interesting that an entire article could be devoted to him and his cause, but dammit all, this is a concert review and it demands the ink.

"Good evening, brothers and sisters," relayed an older man from Kuti's Egypt 80 Ensemble, thereby setting the tone for the evening. He then led the band through a spirited and spectacular opening number, which emphasized the tight musicianship rather than the politics. Kuti was then introduced. He came on the stage, hands raised, fists clenched, ready to go. He instantly turned on the spite. He told the crowd of Thomas Sankara, a respected African leader who was slain because he was not going to allow the West African Economic Community to continue to be the stooge to the west. The African version of the Great Conspiracy. The band kicked into what Kuti announced as "U.S." ("Underground System"), which the audience took as a double entendre.

The audience churned to the beat. Whacked out Deadheads did their epileptic thing next to disciples of Malcom X. Kuti succeeded in bringing everyone together through his universal music.

His backing band was truly a mighty thing to behold. A 35-piece, that's 35-piece band, putting the groove into the politics. There were usually only 20-25 people on the stage at a time, playing everything from a wood block to a saxophone. It was this polyrhythmic texture that ignited the people.

Kuti spoke once more of the struggle. He surmised that "Africa doesn't need benefits, Africa needs leaders." He continued that the only way Africa will get a true leader is when the U.S. and the West begin to respect Africa. He then introduced his next song "O.D.O.O" ("Overtake Don't Overtake Overtake"), a funky blend of jazz, calypso and angst.

Kuti is angry at the world. His mother was killed by his government, and he was imprisoned for something he didn't do. Through his music, he presents his views. If he can't unite the world through harmony, he wants to unite the world through anger. At Pearl Street on Monday night, he united the room. Hindus were jamming with preppies, and Muslims were dancing with atheists. Whether or not Kuti could do this on a large scale, he will persevere. His struggle will continue.

Pianist Coxe mixes legends

By NANCY BJORSON
Collegian Correspondent

Franz Liszt, one of the greatest of all pianists, dominated the 19th century. In his compositions, he extended the range of the piano's capacity, and influenced all succeeding composers. The extent of his achievement can be clearly heard in his two famous works, Saint Francis of Assisi's Sermon to the Birds, and Saint Fracis of Paolo Walking on the Waves.

Nigel Coxe, a Jamaican born, British trained, concert pianist will perform a concert featuring Liszt's two legendry works and he will contrast them to Grieg's masterpiece, Norwegian Peasant Dances. The program commences with a Haydn sonata in D and continues with Schubert in B flat.

The Norwegian Peasant Dances is Norwegian folk music transcribed for the piano. Coxe explains, "Grieg was the person who first developed a truly Norwegian music, and in this he was encouraged by Liszt, who was one of the greatest figures of the nineteenth century."

The legends are tone poems inspired by episodes in the lives of the Saints. Saint Francis of Assisi was moved to preach to the birds that filled the wayside "and not one moved during the whole sermon." Saint Francis of Paolo was denied a ride across the straits of Messina - his saintlyhood was challenged and he consequently walked to the other side.

Mr. Coxe explains, "I have put these two composers together in order to show how Grieg was not only a great late romantic but he looked forward to the twentieth century. I'm playing some earlier composers so he (Grieg) will be seen in the context of what preceeded him."

Nigel Coxe has concertized extensively throughout Europe and the United States. Most recently he returned from a tour of the Orient which included an intriguing Royal Gala performance of the Grieg concerto with the National Symphony of Thailand in the presence of Princess Sirindhorn of Thailand. His many recordings include a just-released compact disc for Harmonia Mundia USA entitled Showstoppers, featuring music of Grainger, Gershwin, and Eubie Blake. Mr. Coxe's previous compact disc of Grainger's music was chosen by Ovation in May 89 as a Recording of Distinction and described as "the most persuasive introduction to (Grainger's) piano playing around."

Tickets on sale

UPC has announced that tickets for the upcoming The The show are on sale today at the Fine Arts Center box office.

The The will be playing the Fine Arts Center on Friday, Oct. 20.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

HAPPY BIRTHDAY! IN THE NEXT YEAR OF YOUR LIFE: Ask an authority figure to define your work duties to avoid confusion. Real estate proves a wise investment in late fall. A health problem improves, thanks to a doctor's diet-and-exercise program. Your new image gives you greater self-confidence. A romantic relationship adds excitement to your life. Business and pleasure can be successfully combined in a late summer trip. A move to another town will give you and your family a fresh perspective.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Take everything into consideration before you make drastic changes. Remaining cool and unflustered helps you combat minor irritations and stresses. Keep promises to your children.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Go about your everyday tasks with methodical dispatch. Comparison shopping will help you reduce costs. Make the best use of your talents. Cupid is smiling. Be receptive.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Open discussions with your co-workers. Team effort is needed to boost profits. Reinforce clear-cut, intelligent perceptions while favorable aspects prevail. Your versatility can be a big plus in business.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Implement changes that you know can lead to a financial recovery. Shop around for loans. Avoid overspending on entertainment and luxuries. Refrain from starting a battle you cannot finish.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Choose technical equipment you can handle easily. A neat appearance counts big on school or job interviews. Someone from your past reappears. Loved one is watching to sew how you react.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Start an educational investment plan for a child. Be careful whom you choose to represent you; you will be held responsible for what is done in your name. A troublesome employee will make you cope with more than your usual workload today. Agreements will be difficult to finalize. Influential person is holding the top hand. A friend or neighbor shares astounding news.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Financial deals are easier to negotiate now. A real estate venture begins to show a profit. Others are counting on you to take the lead; do not let them down. Write letters.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Come to grips with financial problems. Consult experts and revise the family budget. Attending a social function will put you in touch with potential romantic partners tonight. Dress elegantly.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Financial pressures could lead you to stifle a personal desire. Do not despair! Socializing could put you in touch with influential people who will back a pet project. A new relationship begins.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20- Feb. 18): Devote more time to professional reading to keep abreast of trends. Discuss family problems calmly and rationally. A generation gap will be closed by a meaningful exchange. Romance looks happy.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): If possible, postpone travel. A trip will be more rewarding if taken at a later date. Take careful stock of your assets and set some new short-term goals. Home beckons this evening.

up, but didn't." Hartford proved they had what it took to be a good tennis team. They regained their composure and took the first two doubles matches to even the score at four matches apiece.

The meet was now in the hands of Venessa Kershner and Yamaski, the -3 doubles tandem. Yamaski served out the match, pulled out another win, and propelled UMass to victory.

"It was a team performance," Gentzler said. "I'm really proud of my team. If I had to pick a hero, it would have to be Shizuko. She had a lot of pressure on her and she was great. I have to tip my hat to her."

Next up for UMass will be Providence College, at 3 p.m. today on the Upper Boyden Courts. The team also travels to Fairfield for a meet Thursday.

Providence usually finishes near the top of the Big East, somewhere in the top three. Last year, UMass played Providence twice, losing both times.

"We've played them close before, and it will be close today. I'm not making any predictions. It will be a good match," commented Gentzler.

The match was originally scheduled for September 19th, but was cancelled because of rain.

Reds keeper Skye Eddy (5 saves) punted one to midfield and the WRams' Chrissie Jeremiah took the ball on the one bounced and hammered it right past Eddy.

UMass continues to improve on restarts, as they would also convert off a long boot. Ten minutes into the second half, Lisa Mickelson boomed a direct free kick past Haber.

"She stepped up to it and hammered it from about 43 yards out," said Rudy. Her nerve problem has been diagnosed as bursitis and Rudy said, "She's hurting but she's playing."

Short kicks: The Reds improved to 5-2 on the year and this win sets up a huge regional and national matchup Friday afternoon, as UMass will host Connecticut.

UConn is ranked fourth in the country and before the start of the URI game, UMass was ninth. In New England, the Lady Huskies hold the top spot and Massachusetts is gnawing at their coattails.

Radja prevented from playing for Celtics by federal court injunction

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Celtics lost a round yesterday in their quest to have Dino Radja in uniform this season when a federal judge approved a preliminary injunction sought by his former team in Yugoslavia.

The request was filed by Jugoplastika, the Yugoslav team that paid Radja $11,000. The Celtics drafted the 6-foot-10 forward on June 27 and signed him to a contract paying him $425,000 plus additional benefits.

Neil Jacobs, attorney for the Celtics, had argued Monday that Radja's contract could be compared to a college athletic scholarship.

But U.S. District Judge Douglas P. Woodlock sided with Paul Parcher, attorney for Jugoplastika, who had argued that Radja had signed a valid professional contract.

In his ruling, Woodlock said it appeared Jugoplastika had a valid contract with Radja, signed in 1988, and that his agreement with the Celtics undermined his former team's ability to compete and also retain players, comparing what the Celtics had done to "poaching."

"Sports have a way of teaching . . . the way in which youngsters view what is appropriate and what isn't appropriate," Woodlock said.

"And it is to a large degree, by the concept of sportsmanship, the lesson that is taught by the ability of the highest bidder to reach into a stocked pond and poach from it, is not a lesson that seems to me one that is in the public interest."

Woodlock said the preliminary injunction would remain in effect for two years. But it was unclear whether it ran from the start of the Tuesday's ruling or from when Radja signed his contract with Jugoplastika. Meantime, Woodlock stayed the preliminary injunction until 5 p.m. Oct. 5, one day before the Celtics open training camp, to allow both parties to seek a review. He also ordered Jugoplastika to pay a $450,000 bond.

Radja, who has said in the past that he would not return to play for Jugoplastika, repeated that position Tuesday, adding that "the only person hurt here is me."

UM blanks Yale, 4-0

Forwards help contribute to shutout

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

In a few weeks, when the scouting reports start getting out on the University of Massachusetts field hockey team, coaches may be talking about the Minutewomen's big three.

That would be the forward line of Mara Fratassio, Kathy DeAngelis, and Dawn Trumbauer, the three players who propelled UMass to a 4-1 victory over Yale University yesterday.

"Those three forwards are really starting to work well together," UMass coach Pam Hixon said.

Fratassio scored two goals (that makes four in the last two games for the senior forward), the first coming just 47 seconds into the game to get UMass an early 1-0 lead and the second with two minutes left in the first half, to put the Minutewomen up 2-0 going into halftime.

Trumbauer struck early in the second half for UMass, beating Yale goalie Sue Sabatino just 38 seconds into the second. Trumbauer also assisted on Fratassio's second goal which was not an easy thing to do given the conditions caused by the rain in New Haven earlier in the day.

"The conditions were somewhat slippery," Hixon said. "It made our passing game difficult."

Another fact that makes this offensive outburst all the more impressive is that Sabatino, who had 10 saves in the game, is the alternate goaltender for the United States National Under-21 team. So UMass wasn't actually playing the part of the bully.

DeAngelis put the finishing touches on the win, which raises the Minutewomen's record to 5-2, with her fifth goal of the season with 24 minutes left in the game. That put UMass up 4-0 and Hixon could empty her bench.

Yale forward Ann Lehman broke up the shutout when she beat UMass goalie Lisa Charron (six saves), who had relieved starter Phillipa Scott (four saves) at the beginning of the second half. There was 14 minutes left on the clock after Lehman's goal.

Despite the fact that Hixon emptied her bench, everyone did not get to play, though. Senior midfielder Bernie Martel was sidelined with a pulled hamstring.

"We're trying to rest her for the weekend because she'll be a big factor against Penn State and St. Joes," Hixon said.

The last few games, in spite of the positive results (UMass has won its last two games), have had one negative effect on the Minutewomen.

"These past five days have been tough on my players," Hixon said. "Playing in the mud really has hurt our legs."

But there have been no serious injuries and the last two results may have a long-lasting effect on the rest of the season.

"We're starting to show some character," Hixon said. "And that is more important than where we are ranked."

Those three forwards and that character may add up to a high ranking before the end of the season.

Gaudette leads ninth-ranked UMass past Rhody 3-1 in disappointing effort

By RICK SETO
Collegian Staff

Coach Jim Rudy didn't sound like a happy man after his women's soccer team downed the University of Rhode Island 3-1 on the road yesterday.

"We played poorly," Rudy admitted. "I was disappointed personally because we didn't play better. [The effort] wasn't what we're accustomed to with this group.

"A lot of people had a quiet game. We didn't have too much flair or personality."

But the day was not a total loss; after all, it was a win.

If there had to be bright spot, it certainly had to be junior Sue Gaudette. The junior forward scored two goals within a 10-minute span in the second half, the first being the game-winner and the second being the icing on the cake.

With the game tied at one apiece, Gaudette got hold of the ball in the box and beat keeper Alison Haber (15 saves) from 12 yards out to put UMass up 2-1. Later at the 72nd minute, Gaudette received from Holly Hellmuth on a lob and lofted the ball over Haber's head.

"Gaudette was by far the best player on the field," said Rudy. "She nutmeged a defender [slipped the ball between the defender's legs]. She took on defenders and beat them."

Gaudette's two goals gave her four additional points on the season, giving her the team scoring lead (4-1-9). Hellmuth is now third (2-2-6), behind April Kater (2-3-7).

The first half was characteristic for the Reds — they dominated but they could not convert scoring chances.

Rudy describes the tempo of the first 45 minutes: "After 15 minutes, we were all over them and then we panicked."

Asked perhaps why the Reds blacked out, Rudy responded, "They came at us with a slightly different style. I think we were up for an easy [win], but things didn't come easily."

UMass actually trailed to the WRams (0-6) at the half, as URI scored with 33 seconds left during a time confusion, as the official time was shut off with 30 seconds left.

Women's tennis defeats Hartford

Plays Providence today

By C.J. ABATI
Collegian Staff

On Monday afternoon, the Minutewomen's tennis team completed their second match of the season. They took to the road to battle the University of Hartford and after 5½ hours, UMass (1-1) came out on top, taking five of the nine matches.

"It was a great match, really unbelievable," said coach Edwin Gentzler. "Hartford was really good. They made up thier minds to buy themselves a good tennis program. They have four impressive scholarship players and a brand new facility. They are big-time tennis."

The meet started off slow for the Minutewomen, as No. 1 singles player Maura Foley dropped the opening match. Foley's opponent was Hartford's –1 player, Linda Barton, who is the seventh-ranked player in New England. Barton won both sets 6-2, 6-2.

Gail Gericella evened things up as she defeated Hartford's Candi Vintler 6-1, 7-5. Hartford's Jessie Sklar broke the deadlock by defeating Elysa Rosenberg rather easily 6-2, 6-0.

The Minutewomen were determined to go home with a victory. Kere Eddy, Amy Ryan, and Shizuko Yamaski, the Minutewomen's No. 4, 5, and 6 singles players, all won their matches to help the cause. The most exciting of the three was Yamaski's match. She dropped the first set and was down 4-0 in the second. She hung tough, took the set and won the tiebreak to win the match 0-6, 6-4, 7-6.

"We were ahead 4-2 after the singles, which was incredible," stated Gentzler. "Hartford could have given

Minutemen fall to Yale, 1-0

By ADRIENNE MATT
Collegian Staff

In a mediocre effort against an average team, the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team fell 1-0 to Yale yesterday on the Hill. Yale didn't have many offensive opportunities nor were they threatening during any one point in the game. UMass failed to create dangerous offensive chances, yet outshot Yale 14-13.

"Their effort was mediocre," said head coach Jeff Gettler. "The team had stretches of lethargic play."

The action in the first half was tension-building and the pace was quick. Thirty minutes into the half, freshman goalkeeper Steve Armenti was knocked in the back of the head by a Yale defender who swept into the box to assist a teammate. Armenti is currently suffering from a slight concussion. Senior Jon Gruber stepped in for Armenti.

UMass shots on goal were either wide or within a hair's width of the goal post. Some rolled gently, just missing the net, and others soared over the fence.

The Minutemen seemed to wind down for the second half and never fully regained their momentum. Yale fared well in the backfield but almost broke down in the last five minutes.

"I think the lack of the effort was partly due to the fact that Armenti wasn't in goal, [junior Pete] McEvoy was just warming up. He picked us up," said Gettler. "Then when Pete got that hit in the head [due to three players attempting a header] and had to come out again, it hurt our swing. He's central to our type of play but we can go deep enough [into the bench] that it shouldn't effect us that much. It did in this game."

Nine minutes into the second half, Yale senior forward Dave Goldblatt scored the only goal of the game unassisted, leaving the score 1-0, Yale. Another nine minutes later, junior forward Von Hughs had a breakaway opportunity and the ball met Gruber's chest as he pulled out of the right side of the box. UMass ended the game with five saves; Yale had four.

"[Dan] Lawrence did a nice job for us. [Sophomore Kevin] Perna was good coming off the bench and [senior Gael] Sullivan played gutty," said Gettler. "Today's results were dissapointing. We should have had a much better performance. It wasn't up to par."

You'll fall in love . . . with France's splendor

By PETER LEON
Collegian Staff

So you have decided to take the big jaunt across the Atlantic to Europe. But being a sensible person you decided to get some facts about the places you want to visit.

Here is a list of things you will absolutely need:

- A large backpack with lots of pockets, which makes it easy to carry all your stuff. Leave some extra room for your purchases. The best way to pack is to pack the backpack, walk for at least a mile and a half, go back, take all the heavy stuff out and repack.
- Clothes to fit the season. Remember most of Europe is warmer due to the Gulf Stream.
- The most excellently comfortable shoes you have.
- A phrase book is incredibly useful. People are always friendlier when you try to speak their language.
- A Eurail pass. The best bargain available and convenient too!
- An International Student I.D. Card, which comes with health insurance and lots of discounts (and it is only $10).
- A youth hostel pass. There is no reason to spend more than $10 a night for a place to sleep. What you want to see is on the outside!
- American Express Travelers Checks. Any other company and it will be difficult to get them replaced.
- A Mastercard or Visa because in Europe they just don't take the American Express Card.
- Your medications in enough quantities to last the trip and then some.
- Tylenol or the such.
- A book, for the trains.
- Let's Go for either Europe, or if your traveling with a group, have each person buy an individual country book that you will be visiting. The Europe edition is good, but the others are much more detailed.

"The atmosphere (in Paris) is amazing. . . . The most enjoyable activity is sitting in a cafe for hours just watching the world go by."

- MOST IMPORTANT — When I was there the French government still required visas of all American tourists. Check with any consulate or Embassy before you leave, or they might not let you in. (There is a consulate in Boston, at the Stafford building, next to the Park Plaza Hotel.)

Now here is a list of the places in France I visited and some general information, some of which Let's Go doesn't provide.

Paris: This is my favorite European city. The atmosphere here is amazing, especially in spring, before all the tourists arrive. By far the most enjoyable activity is sitting in a cafe for hours just watching the world go by. Most cafe owners will allow you to sit for hours and only spend about a dollar for coffee.

Eiffel Tower

The best place to stay is not a youth hostel, they are crowded and cost almost as much as the one star hotels.

Two hotels in price range are: the Celtik, which is right at Montparnasse train station, and it also is in the Latin quarter where a lot of students hang out. There are also many movie theaters that show films in V.O., which means original version in English. Also there is Hotel le Home Latin, more uptown, and close to the Sorbonne, this is a nicer place.

The things to see are relatively well-known: Notre Dame, Sacre Coeur, the Louvre, the Eiffel Tower, the Catacombs, etc. But the best attraction is the Musee d'Orsay, which houses the best and biggest collection of Renoir, Monet and other impressionist paintings. It also has other amazing stuff to see. It was built out of an old train station and the roof is all glass so there is a lot of natural light.

The Metro is the best way to travel Paris streets. It is so nice and efficient; the U.S. just can't compete. Buy the Formule 1 which lets you ride all day for about $4 (one fare is about 85 cents.) You can also buy a çarnet of ten for a great discount.

Near Paris is the most ornate chateau to be found in Europe, Liz's place in London runs a close second. I speak of Versailles. This is where Marie Antoinette used to amuse herself by pretending to be a peasant in a little hamlet. The chateau has beautiful rooms with chandeliers, tapestries, clocks, paintings and the well-known hall of mirrors. A must see.

Angers: The place where I lived is not for the tourist really, but still a great place to live. It is a great place to settle in for a few days and take day trips by train or rent a bike. Nearby are some beautiful chateaus. There is a chateau in Angers, a beautiful cathedral, and six small museums, even one that has a bust of Ben Franklin but the better chateaus are at Saumur and in other parts of the Loire Valley. There is a youth hostel, called an auberge de jeunesse, and some student dorms, called foyers, where you can stay. Also pick up a map of all the youth hostels in France at the hostel whether you stay there or not. It lists the nearest train stations, number of beds, prices, and telephone numbers.

The Riviera: Amazing, though it isn't the Carribean it's so close it just doesn't matter. It stretches from Marseilles to Italy, and if you are beach bum or sun worshipper this is it. There is a little town there called Frejus that has a hostel and a enormous beach. It is next to St. Raphael, and across the bay from world famous San Tropez. Frejus is poor-man's land though. You can go to a supermarket, buy food and cook it at the hostel. There are also Roman aquaduct ruins, which you see on the way to the hostel. It is also easy to take day trips to Cannes, Nice, Marseille, and Italy. Be careful: Let's Go doesn't know about this place and says the closest hostel is 20 kilometers away.

"It is also easy to take day trips (from the Riviera) to Cannes, Nice, Marseille, and Italy."

Strasbourg: A beautiful town in the Alsace part of France and has a strong German influence because the two countries had fought over the area for centuries. The European parliament sits here making it the political capital of the Europe. It offers the most modern hostel around. Though private it still is cheap and it has a full cafeteria and accepts Visa. It's called CIARUS. Be careful: the directions to it in Let's Go are wrong, if you speak French ask a police officer. Things to see are the churches and different style of architecture in the old city. Skip paying to see the mechanical clock move, which is in the cathedral. Stop by at an odd hour just to see it because it is enormous.

"The things to see are relatively well-known: Notre Dame, Sacre Couer, the Louvre, the Eiffel Tower, the Catacombs, etc. But the best attraction is the Musee d'Orsay, which houses the best and biggest collection of Renoir, Monet and other impressionist paintings."

There you have it: France. But of course this a mere tidbit of what there is really to do in all of Europe. Don't just limit yourself to one country. There are the small towns to find, odd holes in the wall to crawl into, and generally bizarre places to see.

Sunday, Aug. 20

We're somewhere over the Atlantic. My watch says it's 12:06 a.m. New York time, but what time it really is escapes me.

I have a window seat on this El Al flight, allowing me to see nothing except darkness and my own reflection. To my left is Geoff Harper, 20, editor in chief of the Emory Wheel, Emory University, Atlanta.

Harper, never at a loss for words, downed a Maccabbee beer, his first, and gave his reason for wanting to go to Israel.

"It's free," he said. "You'd have to be an idiot to turn this down."

Harper speaks the truth — at least the truth among the 15 editors in chief selected by the Anti-Defamation League, New York, for the 1989 Mission to Israel. The 10-day tip, if all goes well, will include stops in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, as well as a kibbutz in the Upper Galilee.

The purpose of the trip, said ADL representative Jeffrey Ross, is to give people — editors, members of government, professors — a well-rounded impression of Israel.

But for 13 men and 2 women on this trip, the 10 1/2 hour plane ride is a time not just to look ahead, but to think back.

Tradition and religion aside, many of the editors spent their time thinking about girlfriends and boyfriends instead of the Galilee. The food on the plane didn't lend to forgetting home-cooked meals either. The status of the Mets, for the time being, has been deemed more relevant than the Western Wall.

Wednesday, Aug. 23

Rubber Soul, the Beatles album in my Walkman, is a good compliment for the sunny skies and bumpy ride from Tel Aviv.

Tel Aviv, which overlooks the Mediterranean Sea, is not a beautiful city. A boontown built 80 years ago, one can make comparisons to the towns built after the California gold rush.

The sea is warm and salty, the beach hot and an excellent place to take a nap.

Our group stayed at the Dan Panorama hotel, one of more than a dozen hotels catering to Westerners in Tel Aviv. Rooms for two are $102/night, but less expensive hotels can be found elsewhere along the Mediterranean. Mornings at the Dan were highlighted by an enormous breakfast, complete with rolls and croissants, smoked salmon, several Israeli cheeses and tasty Jaffa orange juice.

In Tel Aviv, there are plenty of shops for tourists, in which one can buy Israeli jewelry, handicrafts and food. Handmade Israeli jewelry, featuring an Eilat stone in sterling silver setting, costs about $40, although some are as little as $20. A point to remember when you shop: shopkeepers love to bargain with you.

Israel has about 12 daily newspapers. One, The Jerusalem Post, is printed in English, and includes world news and American ball scores (important to us Cubs fans).

The Post costs 75 cents and is much better than the International Herald Tribune, another English-language paper that is twice the price and a day behind.

The nightlife in Tel Aviv was deemed acceptable by members of our group. Adam Schrager, editor in chief of the University of Michigan Daily.

"Last night will be an evening I'll remember," the tall, dark and bloodshot Schrager said. "It will go down in my almanac of good evenings."

Schrager and others enjoyed Maccabbee and Gold Star beers (they claim Gold Star is better) until 3 a.m. Tuesday night. The road to Haifa will be long, no doubt.

My girlfriend gave me her ET doll so I'd remember to "phone home." Good thing, because to call the United States is expensive. Just to have the call placed costs $3.50.

Aah, girl. . .

Thursday morning, Aug. 24

I just woke up after a good night's sleep at the Kibbutz Hotel in Kibbutz K'far Giladi near the Israel-Lebanon border.

The hotel is part of a chain throughout Israel and costs about half as much as the Dan Panorama. In spite of that cost, phone bills are still huge, as evidenced by Emory's Harper, who spent $125 on his overnight phone bill, $64 of that coming from one 30-minute call to Atlanta.

Thursday evening, Aug. 24

After leaving K'far Giladi, we visited "The Good Fence" on the Israel-Lebanon border.

The name comes from the fact that some Lebanese can enter Israel through a gate in the fence. Most of the people who enter are seeking medical care not available in Israel's war-torn neighbor of the north.

To visit "The Good Fence" is free, and shops near the fence sell inexpensive food and souvenirs.

Friday, Aug. 25

We arrived in Jerusalem and among our first stops was the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, the site of Jesus' crucificion and burial. We've been told we will also visit the Basilica of the Nativity, the site of his birth, and throughout this leg of the trip we have been given several pieces of information on the beginnings of Christianity.

I'm given a moment to rest as others go into the center of this beautiful church to kneel on the site where Jesus was believed to be crucified and buried, and later where he rose from the dead. To get to the church, we passed through the Moslem quarter of the Old City of Jerusalem. Shops along Via de la Rosa are supposed to be closed because of the ongoing Intifada, but shopkeepers are willing to open their doors to tourists and sell their wares.

Ron Perry, our tour guide, said that's not uncommon. He said he was showing a group of senators the Via de la Rosa when a shopkeeper opened his door. The group went in, Perry said. The shipkeeper then closed the door behind them and quietly sold goods to the senators.

Goods in the Moslem quarter differ from goods available elsewhere in the Old City, and the sharp-minded will quickly realize that clothing, such as silk scarves and t-shirts, can be bought at reasonable prices and high quality. Also throughout the quarter are several foods that are both inexpensive and delicious.

Sunday, Aug. 27

We saw the Dome of the Rock and El-Aksa today, and like all the religious sites — Jewish, Christian and Moslem — it is free, although you may be asked to give a small donation.

Yesterday we saw Masada, the Dead Seas and parts of the Jewish quarter of the Old City of Jerusalem. All are must-sees for different reasons.

Masada costs about $8 to see. You ride in a cable car from the gift shop to the top of the mountain, the famous home of Jews who committed suicide in 73 A.D. rather than be conquered by Romans.

It's hot in this desert-site; it is recommended you bring a cap and sunglasses,a s well as a supply of bottled water.

Masada today is a tourist attraction, but luckily much of what was once the palace of King Herod the Great and villas and stores are intact. You can see the oldest synagogue in the world as well as several cisterns and what were once swimming pools. A tour of the site takes about two hours.

The Dead Sea is 33 percent salt, and also rich in magnesium deposits. If the water touches your tongue, you will join a 15-minute spitting festival with any other unfortunates.

But the reason you spend about $5 to see the Dead Sea is to float. Walk into the knee-high water, sit down and lift your legs; You are as buoyant as a beach ball.

Because of the magnesium, your skin will feel like baby oil. But to truly affect the state of the epidermis, cover yourself with black, hot, medicinal mud. You look stupid, but after you wash the mud off in a nearby shower, your skin feels wonderful. The mud is supposed to make you look younger, but if our acne clears, we'll be happy.

"It felt like I was floating weightless in a large carton of Morton salt," said Kelly Whiteside, editor in chief of the Rutgers University Daily Targum. "It was incredible."

The sea also contains high levels of bromine, a chemical which acts as a tranquilizer (spurring "Don't swim and drive" comments from several editors). No one believed it, but we were all snoozing within 15 minutes of our return to the bus.

At night, the streets of the Jewish quarter of Jerusalem come alive. Youths crowd the streets, music blares from cafes and dozens of street merchants try to sell their earrings, bracelets and other bangles to hordes of tourists and others.

"There's a real wide range," said Dan Eggen, editor in chief of the University of Minnesota Daily. "The stuff is inexpensive."

To the patient tourist, there are some amazing deals. One can easily buy their girlfriend, mother or sister an assortment of jewelry for under $20.

> "The reason you spend about $5 to see the Dead Sea is to float."

Monday, Aug. 28

The Mt. Zion hotel, where our group stayed, was just one of several Westernized hotels within walking distance of the Old City in Jerusalem. A room runs about $150, while a suite tops $200. The view was panoramic; on a clear day you could see Jerusalem and miles of surrounding landscape.

On our last day in Israel, the time comes to reminisce about Israeli food. While they try hard, it's hardly outstanding. All among our group made public their desire for a cheeseburger or chili dog upon our return to the states.

Be sure to try an appetizer called a "Moroccan cigar," spicy beef wrapped in a thin fried dough. But by no means feel you are confined to Israeli food in Israel. Everything from pizza to kosher Italian and Chinese food is available, most at less than $15 per person.

Tuesday, Aug. 29

Our 10-day trip over, now safe on our El Al flight to New York's Kennedy Airport, all in our group conclude Israel is an interesting place to visit. Unlike what we see on television, it is safe to walk (or get lost) in the streets of Tel Aviv and Jerusalem. Beyond and political rights and wrongs, Israel is a beautiful country, rich in history, culture and religion.

In 1988, Domino's Pizza founder, Tom Monaghan, made a personal donation of $50,000 to the Michigan Committee to End Tax Funded Abortion. The committee was formed to support a referendum on the November, 1988, ballot. The referendum was passed by voters, and essentially banned use of tax money for abortions.

The donation was made with Mr. Monaghan's personal funds, not with Domino's Pizza, Inc. money.

The donation was made to the Michigan committee, not Operation Rescue, as has been rumored. Domino's Pizza has never contributed money to the group known as Operation Rescue.

Domino's Pizza does not contribute any amount of money from each pizza sold to any political or religious organization.

With the boycott of Domino's Pizza stores, independent owner/operators and employees are being unfairly involved in the issue. While Domino's Pizza franchisees agree to live up to certain business practices and standards, they are not, and have never been asked to agree with any ideological or political views.

Domino's Pizza's 800 franchisees are responsible for more than 120,000 employees nationwide, and hold many different views of the reproductive rights issue.

Finally, we value the student customers of the 5-college area. We hope that now that you have the facts about this issue, you will continue to give us the opportunity to deliver to you the finest pizza in Western Massachusetts.

Discover Taiwan

A jewel of Asia that combines old and new

By MICHAEL WESTER
Collegian Staff

I've spent most of my life thinking of Taiwan as some remote, faceless land that did nothing more than serve as one huge manufacturing plant, making plastic toys, rubber dinosaurs, umbrella handles, sneaker soles and other objects you never imagine anyone labors over, but nevertheless are essential to our material existence.

When the opportunity arose for me to visit Taiwan on a UMass-sponsored Summer Intensive Language Program, I jumped at the chance — not necessarily for the locale, but because of my interest in learning Chinese.

Buddhist statue at Fo Guang Shan

In my mind I conjured up all my old stereotypes — I imagined Taiwan would be a sprawling mass of people shuttered up in immense factories, churning out the above-mentioned goods.

It didn't hit me until I arrived there how wrong I was.

What Taiwan turned out to be was a tropical island, the likes of which I had never seen. Blue-water beaches and scenic mountain ranges are as common as large industrial cities that dot the country.

Taiwan, an island roughly the area of Massachusetts and Connecticut combined, is located about 100 miles off the east coast of mainland China. It has one of the densest populations per square mile on the planet — with a rapidly-expanding population of 20 million.

The island itself is bisected by a large mountain range. The highest mountain in this range, Jade Mountain (elevation, 12,960 ft.) is the tallest in Northeast Asia, surpassing even Japan's Mt. Fuji. This range basically separates Taiwan into two halves, the relative sparsely populated eastern half, and the densely populated western half. Taiwan's three largest cities, Taipei, Taichung, and Kaoshiung are all located to the west of the range.

Taipei, the provincial capital of Taiwan, is also the largest city, with a population of three million. It has many of the big-city qualities you associate with such metrpoli as New York — smog, traffic jams, noise, strange odors, pollution, industrial factories, and crowds of people.

Taipei is also host to many positive aspects. I found that what makes Taipei different from large cities in the U.S. is the humanness of it. Taipei is not filled with oppressive skyscrapers like New York or Boston. A walk down the street in Taipei will put you in touch with real people — street vendors, pedestrians and shopkeepers. Every store you pass seems open to the street, giving the city a neighborhood quality in spite of its immense size.

As a foreigner, you have to get used to being an oddity to the locals, and this manifests itself in being stared at most of the time. However, people as a whole are polite and courteous.

The city is also home to several traditionally-styled Confucian and Taoist temples. To visit one of these is to step into the China of the past. With their vibrant coloring and ornate structure, the temples are fascinating, seemingly not just for worshipping but for relaxation.

Taipei is also home of the Chiang Kai-shek Memorial Hall, National Concert Hall and National Theater complex — sort of Taiwan's answer to New York's Lincoln Center. Home to many of Taipei's cultural events, the three buildings are separated by a large, tiled square. One of the largest wide-open spaces in the city, it's the type of place that would drive skateboarders berserk.

Western influence is definitely visible in Taiwan. In Taipei, as well as in several other cities, you can find franchises such as 7-11, Wendy's, Kentucky Fried Chicken, and of course, the ever-present McDonald's.

I spent the summer studying at Tunghai University, located on the outskirts of Taichung, the island's third largest city. Taichung is located in the center of the island, so it served as a good springboard for travel to the rest of the island. The great thing about Taiwan is that most sections of the island are within a day's commute — from Taichung you can travel South to Kending to enjoy a tropical beach scene one associates with Club Med vacations; or north to enjoy the nightlife of Taipei; or west into the scenic beauty of the mountains. Taiwan is filled with inexpensive lodging in the form of youth hostels. Additionally, the bus system is extensive, so travelling is fairly easy.

Cuisine in Taiwan can be delicious or unappealing, depending on your tastes. One thing for sure, though — it's different from your typical Pioneer Valley Chinese food restaurant. With the exception of a few dishes, the two seemed entirely unrelated.

Such delicacies as pork intestine, chicken's feet, pig's achilles' tendon, duck's blood cakes, and barbecued squid on a stick can be found in Taiwan. I remember at one banquet I went to, I eyed something that looked like bean sprouts and decided to try some. Only when I brought the supposed veggies closer to my face, I noticed that each one had two tiny black eyes.

Of course the food wasn't all bad. In fact, it has already been one month since my return, and I still miss sitting down to a meal of "Shui Jiao," (Chinese dumplings) and a bowl of "Suan La Tang," (hot and sour soup). The combination completely filled me up for less than $2.

Taiwan has accepted the influx of Western culture and modernization while remaining true to its traditional culture. It is a country that has given me many memories.

History comes alive!

A trip to Egypt is a trip to the annals of time

By CHUCK ABEL
Collegian Staff

A trip to Egypt should definitely be included in any plans to travel the world.

Aside from the Pyramids and the countless other sights where ancient Egyptian architecture and culture can be explored, there are things few people ever knew existed and which are equally as important to the modern world as the 3,000 year-old sights.

Egypt is one of the best places to see, hear and touch all aspects of Arabic and Islamic culture, and Cairo, the capital, is a good place to start.

Getting to Cairo isn't hard. All the major airlines have regular flights to Cairo, leaving from Kennedy Airport in New York and from Logan Airport in Boston. KLM seems to have the best deal with round-trip airfare prices that start around $800. Student discount prices can be found, but many restrictions must be followed.

A one month tourist Visa must be obtained before getting on the plane, and can be acquired through the Egyptan Embassy in New York City in person or by mail. An entry Visa can be obtained before entering the country, but is usually a big hassle and could cause a real bad headache.

Hotel accomodations are relatively easy to find, and prices and comfort can vary dramatically. The five-star hotels, most along the Nile River, tend to be pretty touristy and have lots of shops with junk jewelry and gifts that are overpriced.

The cheap hotels are cheap, but offer the more genuine and realistic view of what Cairo is really like. They also have the best belly-dancing shows and are the places the locals like the most.

Getting around Cairo can be an experience. The easiest way to get around is in one of the thousands of black-and-white taxi cabs that zip around the city. The most interesting way to get around, though it can tire even the strongest traveler, is to brave the traffic and crowds and walk.

Walking is also a good way to get to know the city on a more personal level. The streets are lined with little family owned shops and the shopkeepers are usually friendly to foreigners who stray in to buy water and food, or to just look. Fruit juice stands and tea shops abound, and are good places to stop in for a drink — something that should be done as often as possible. Women are not allowed in most of the tea shops and will be asked to leave if they enter one, especially the real neighborhood joints where all the local men hang out.

The most challenging mode of transportation is by bus. Buses are always packed to the hilt and don't always stop where they're supposed to. Most people just run along side and hop on, and hope they don't slip. Getting off is done the same way, by hopping off and running.

The Ramesseum (Temple of Ramses II) in Luxor, Egypt.

The most popular tourist sights in Cairo are the Pyramids, which lie 20 minutes from the center of the city by taxi, and the Egyptian Museum, which is in the center of the city. But, these sights are only worth a brief look, as they are plagued by peddlers who like to hound tourists into submission.

One of the more interesting sights is the Cairo tower, a good place to get a bird's eye view of Cairo and the desert that stretches from the edge of the city to the horizon. There is also the Citadel, which was the fortress that overlooked and guarded Cairo during the Middle Ages. The Mosques of Ibn Tolun and Sultan Hassan, two of the most important Islamic leaders and bulders in Egypt's history, are also must-sees.

A trip, or several, should be made to the many markets in Cairo. The most famous of them is Khan-el-Khalili, a labyrinth of narrow shop lined streets and alleys. Anything and everything can be bought in the Khan. There is a lot of tourist junk on the main drags, but quality gifts and wares can be found in the side alleys.

The other market worth mentioning is the Bab-el-Luk market just off Bab-el-Luk square. Bab-el-Luk market is one of the many food markets in Cairo. Fresh vegetables and fruit are displayed next to the butcher's hanging carcasses of beef and lamb. The best time to visit the markets is in the early morning, before the sun hits and begins to make the meat smell. Early morning is also when all the women do their shopping, so most of the choicest food gets taken by noon.

The local food is generally bland with beans and bread being the staples. Tourists should stay away from the street-venders and corner sandwich shops, even though they are always packed with people and the food looks good. The local bacteria and germs also hang out here, and they can give you a nasty case of diarrhea if you're not used to them.

A wide variety of restaurants, serving everything from the Egyptian delicacies of Kabab and Kofta and pigeon to Japanese cuisine, can be found near the center of Cairo. The Zamalik Restaurant is the best place to get real good inexpensive Egyptian food that won't cause diarrhea. Tourists should avoid tap water, too, because the stuff in it is different from the stuff in Amherst water, leading to potential problems.

After watching the 16-plus million people of Cairo live their daily lives, seeing the sights and markets that everyone flocks to and tasting the food the next place to go in Egypt is Alexandria. Alexandria lies on the Mediterranean Sea and is Egypt's second largest city.

Alexandria is a good place to go after being in Cairo for a few days. The pace is slower. The sea is beautiful. The air and streets are a little cleaner, and the restaurants all serve a good variety of fresh fish.

For the history buff and the closet Egyptologist, Egypt is a dream. There are ancient sites dating back more than 3,000 years all up and down the Nile. Nile cruises are available, and usually stop at all the major sites, such as Thebes and Abu Simbel (the list could go on for pages).

One thing that very few people know is that Egypt lies on the Red Sea and some of the best snorkeling and scuba diving can be done in the Red Sea. Places like Sharm-el-Sheik, Dahab and Taba are all great places to go diving off the coral reefs that grow along the shores of the Sinai peninsula and the Egyptian mainland.

A trip to Egypt, though it sounds good, can be tough. The population in Cairo alone is rising by over a million people a year. The farmers can't produce enough food to feed all the people. There is poverty. There is a broad division between the rich and the poor. There are many problems and a lot of ugliness that can't be overlooked, and it shouldn't. The traveler going to Egypt should keep in mind they are visiter in a very old and traditionally-set nation, and that they should look at everything very carefully and with an open mind. But, they shouldn't try to change it to accommodate their wishes as a traveler.

Contact Lens Alert

Based on new Food and Drug Administration recommendations and on recent studies that indicate an increased frequency of serious eye infections associated with extended wear contact lenses, we are recommending the following:

Extended wear contact lenses should not be worn for any longer than seven continuous days and nights, at which time they should be removed, cleaned thoroughly with a surfactant cleaner and an enzyme cleaner, and run through a sterilization cycle.

For many individuals, removing the lenses and cleaning and disinfecting them as indicated in the above regimen may be desirable even more frequently than once per week.

If you have any questions, please feel free to call one of us at the University Health Services Eye Clinic.

Protesters take over Collegian

By BETH GATELY
Collegian Staff

About 20 people occupied the Collegian newsroom yesterday for more than four hours to protest a recently-published editorial written by the newspaper's editor-in-chief concerning Palestinian-Israeli relations.

The demonstrators also protested the creation of a MultiCultural Affairs desk in place of the Black Affairs desk.

The occupation, which began around noon, did not start peacefully. After a rally on the Campus Center concourse, about 45 students proceeded to the Collegian chanting, "No more Mark."

When they began entering the newsroom, a shoving match ensued between members of the group and a few Collegian staff members. About 30 protesters entered the office. After a few hours, the number of protesters dwindled to 20.

The University of Massachusetts police arrived to the scene and left shortly after order was restored. The administration did not intervene in the demonstration.

Eyad Kishawi, a spokesman for the protesters, who called themselves "concerned community members," said they intend to pursue further action unless Mark resigns by noon today and the Collegian board of editors reinstates the Black Affairs page with an appointed Black editor.

The protesters also demanded that the board establish a page for Third World students with an appointed Third World editor.

Mark said yesterday at a press conference that he will definitely not resign but added that the board of editors and the executive board will review the additional demands.

The editorial in question appeared in the Collegian on Monday, Sept. 18. Mark wrote about his recent trip to the West Bank entitled: "I came, I saw and got stoned in the West Bank."

Two letters to the editor in the Collegian on Sept. 21 called for Mark's resignation in response to the editorial. The letters were accompanied by some 80 signatures.

Protesters Peter Sakura, a senior, Eyad Kishawi, a senior, and Lynley Rappaport, a student in Continuing Education, participate in yesterday's occupation of the Collegian.

Kishawi, a member of the Palestinian Solidarity Committee, said a phrase in which Mark described United Nations representatives as "sickeningly pro-Palestinian" was "racist."

"How can you be sickeningly pro-any people?," Kishawi said. "Everyone has a right to freedom of speech ... but after reading [Mark's] article, a lot of us from the third world community and the campus community are outraged."

"Right now, I would have to say the Collegian is a racist paper," he said.

Mark denied these assertions and, in a column on Monday, Sept. 25, attempted to clarify his editorial:

"The UN is supposed to be a neutral organization," Mark wrote. "This is what I learned in high school history class. In fact, the UN representatives we met ... One who we believed lied ... were sickeningly pro-Palestinian.

"What I meant was, these representatives of the United Nations, people I thought were neutral onlookers, were one-sided — so much so that they lied — that I was sickened.

"Unfortunately, those words led people to think I was racist. The words do not mean that to be Palestinian is a sickness. That's not what I meant or believe. I believe Palestinians are a people to be treated with respect like any other people," Mark wrote.

At the press conference, Mark repeatedly apologized for English TAs plan legal action against dept. for paychecks

By NATHAN KRYSTALL
Collegian Staff

Forty-two graduate student teaching assistants in the English department have not received their paychecks yet this semester and are planning to vent their anger by taking legal action against the department, graduate student Pam Lieske said yesterday.

"We plan on pressing charges," Lieske said. "We want to publicize that nobody cares that we haven't been paid."

Lieske said the TAs have not received their paychecks because Robert Bagg, the chairman of the English department, "screwed up."

"Bagg hired more TAs than he knew we would be financed for," Lieske claimed.

Bagg is now on sabbatical leave and could not be reached for comment at the department.

Professor Jules Chametzky, acting chairwoman of the English department, said the TAs have not been paid because the administration "turned back" all of their contracts because it was believed there were insufficient funds to cover the contracts.

Chametzky said the English department has enough money to pay all of the TAs who are working for the department this fall.

But, the department does not have enought money to finance contracts for a small number of TAs who are scheduled to work only next semester, he said.

The spring contracts for these TAs have been temporarily cancelled but Chemetzky said the contracts for the remaining TAs are expected to be approved by the administration this week.

"The TAs will certainly get paid this week or next," he said. "I am deeply

Malcolm X restraints lifted

By SCOTT C. HILL
Collegian Staff

The controversy involving the autonomy of the Malcolm X Center was resolved in a meeting yesterday between student staff members and University of Massachusetts administrators.

The parties agreed to overturn a recent decision to require a 1 a.m. curfew for social functions at the center and eliminated authorization restrictions that had been imposed without consultation of the student staff.

A decision to require UMass security to be present at any events which run later than 3 a.m. was also lifted.

Dr. Dennis L. Madson, vice chancellor for student affairs, reaffirmed the Malcolm X Center's freedom to hold social functions as late as the staff deems appropriate, on the condition that they provide their own maintenance, security, and notify the Department of Public Safety.

A general outcry emerged from the African-American community last week when student staff members received a letter from Joseph Zannini, executive director of Housing, outlining the restrictions.

Dr. Arthur Hilson said it was his idea to impose the 1 a.m. curfew for social events not only in the Malcolm X Center, but also campus-wide.

Ric Townes, associate dean of students, said the center has traditionally been student-run with a degree of autonomy, or independence.

"The students felt that the administration was attempting to control the Malcolm X Center," he said.

During the meeting, Zannini said he is attempting to eliminate this perception.

"Housing does not want to run the center," he said. "We appreciate the history of the center as student-run."

Yvette Russell, student staff coordinator, stressed that although notifying the Department of Public Safety of upcoming events was a reasonable request, the need for administrative authorization in the Malcolm X Center was not acceptable.

According to Russell, late night events have occurred in the Malcolm X Center for years without problems. The resolution of this problem will allow the center to continue to function as an African-American social and cultural meeting place.

Senate voids election of 67 senators because of errors

By NATHAN KRYSTALL
Collegian Staff

The Undergraduate Student Senate voted to nullify the elections of 67 student senators last night following a four-hour debate over the question of procedural errors during Monday's elections.

Due to procedural errors in Monday's election, the senate voted to nullify the elections of all senators in the Southwest South, Southwest North, Greek and Commuter areas.

The errors included the late arrival of ballot boxes at the voting centers and the lack of a write-in slot on some ballots.

Also, the names of some candidates were misspelled or appeared twice or in different areas on various ballots.

The senate did ratify the elections of all 35 senators in the Orchard Hill, Central, Sylvan and Northeast areas.

"I'm thrilled that this body actually came together and made a decision," said Student Speaker John Dunlap.

Clarinda Rose-Turner, acting president of the Commuter Area Government, said the Commuter Area elections were not ratified because of "nitpicking reasons."

"The senate's ideals are getting in the way of the reality of what's going on," said Rose-Turner, who opposed nullification of the Commuter Area elections.

"It's not realistic to expect to hold perfect elections," she said.

Traci Davis, president of the Student Government Association, proposed reviewing the elections according to each voting center after a lengthy debate over how to consider ratifying the results.

"Most of the problems with the election centered around ballot box staffing and the time the ballots arrived," Davis said. "The issue should focus on the validity of those individual areas."

Paul DelGallo, who was not re-elected to his commuter area seat, said the senators had a "secondary agenda" when voting for or against the elections' ratification.

"They'll vote for [ratification] if they won so that they'll keep their seat," DelGallo said, "and they'll vote against it if they lost so that they'll get a turn to run again."

But, Sen. Jay Baber (Baker), who was re-elected to his seat, said although he won his election, all the elections should be repeated.

"I have to sacrifice my time and money for the good of the student government," Baber said.

Student Speaker John Dunlap spoke against ratifying the elections, saying the senate cannot proceed in good faith unless the elections are run properly.

"How can I be speaker when the very democratic process that elected us is questionable," Dunlap said.

Dunlap berated the Collegian for not publishing a story announcing the elections, and senators for not volunteering to staff the ballot boxes.

Sen. Chi Amadi, (Third World Caucus), said the senate should approve the results because of the considerable amount of time and money that candidates spent on their campaigns.

"If we're not going to reimburse candidates for the money they spent on the elections, it's not fair," Amadi said.

Graduate student trustee sought

GSS attempting to create new position

By KATHERINE T. LAMOTHE
Collegian Staff

The Graduate Student Senate are attempting to have a graduate student representative named to the University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees.

Senate Vice President Pierre Laliberte told the GSS at its meeting Tuesday night that it is necessary to have graduate representation on the board to lobby against the threat of a new set of budget cuts and increased graduate student fees.

Laliberte said the graduate student trustee position would probably evolve from one of the executive committee positions. The committee is presently composed of a president, a vice president, a treasurer and an executive officer.

He also said since UMass is nationally recognized as a graduate institution, graduate students should have representation from their own student trustee.

He noted that there are fewer graduate students at UMass/Worcester than at the Amherst campus, yet UMass/Worcester has a graduate student trustee.

"Amnesty" works for human rights

By KERRY HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

You may have heard of the human rights organization, Amnesty International, when listening to Peter Gabriel or U2 in concert, but this internationally acclaimed network has a local voice as well.

A branch of Amnesty International, which was established globally in 1961 to advocate for human rights, became a registered student organization at the University of Massachusetts three years ago.

Kara Harrington, a UMass student and co-director of the Amnesty program, said the group's main function is to write letters to "prisoners of conscience" — people who are being detained in prisons across the world because of their political beliefs.

"It is a good organization because it helps people. Sometimes I think that some of these organizations [at UMass] get nothing done because nothing changes," Harrington said. "I feel like I'm doing something."

Harrington said Amnesty International focuses on three main areas, which include working for fair and prompt trials for all political prisoners, attempting to end torture and execution in all cases, and working for the release of prisoners of conscience.

The UMass branch concentrates on the final issue, she said, by assembling its 40 members and writing letters advocating for prisoners' release.

Matt Rappaport, a member of the UMass Amnesty group, said the group writes letters which are classified as "urgent action."

No fee charged for Puerto Rican aid — Red Cross

By KATHERINE T. LAMOTHE
Collegian Staff

The report that the American Red Cross would not help Puerto Rico recover from Hurricane Hugo without a $30,000 service fee was based on rumors started during the initial post-storm chaos, a local Red Cross official said yesterday.

According to Rick Lee, director of the Hampshire County chapter of the American Red Cross, the rumor may have started after the Red Cross was unable to immediately respond to Puerto Rico's Governor Rafael Hernandez Colon's request Saturday for 10,000 cots.

The delivery of the cots was delayed because of transportation problems during the hurricane, he said.

Lee said the delivery of equipment to a disaster-stricken area normally takes about 48 hours. The cots eventually reached the island on Tuesday, along with volunteers, he said.

Colon, frustrated because the cots did not arrive Saturday night, held a press conference and said the Red Cross had refused to deliver the equipment, Lee said.

This statement, may have accounted for the rumor that the agency refused to help the area, Lee said.

Lee said Colon has since apologized and even produced a public service announcement for the Red Cross.

However, Lee said he could not understand where the rumor began about the $30,000 fee. He said when informed Red Cross officials in Washington about the rumor "they were shocked."

The shutdown of many forms of communication because of the hurricane coupled with the Red Cross's traditional moratorium on communication immediately following any disaster may have fueled the rumors circulating through Puerto Rico and the United States, he said.

Lee said this moratorium, or temporary ban on communication, is necessary because, in the first four days after a disaster there is too much work to be done that officials cannot keep in contact with relatives of the victims.

Last night, Lee met with Felipe Barreda of AHORA, the University's Latino student organization. At the end of the one-hour talk, Barreda said, "I did receive on Monday, pending further investigation, what may be considered as unfounded rumor."

He also said he would be talking to Red Cross officials in Washington to get concrete information about the situation.

The group's demand to reinstate the Black Affairs page comes in response to a recent editorial decision to combine African-American, Asian, Hispanic, Native American and other ethnic and cultural communities on campus under one desk.

The change is an effort to expand the desk to include all groups on campus who previously did not have representation under their own desk, Mark said.

Scott Hill, the newly appointed MultiCultural Affairs editor, said, "I hope we will see increasing interest from other groups. Instead of conflict, I wish people would write."

Grad student throws the windows open

By PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Correspondent

Martha Wharton, a University of Massachusetts graduate student, spoke to some 40 people yesterday in the Campus Center about overcoming stereotypes and her experiences as an African-American woman in a lecture entitled "Throwing the Windows Wide Open."

The lecture was part of the "Brown Bag Lunch" series, a weekly program sponsored by the Women's Studies department. The program allows area residents to explore women's issues in the community.

Wharton began her lecture by contrasting her early childhood experiences in a predominantly African-American New Jersey town to life in Beverly, MA, a primarily White town to which her family had relocated.

It was in Beverly that Wharton said she first encountered the challenges that accompany life as a minority.

"I learned what it meant to be Black for the first time when I moved to Beverly," she said. "In New Jersey where I lived, everyone was Black. In Beverly, we were one of the first Black families in town."

Wharton said that in Beverly, she found that people tried to "define " her using stereotypical guidelines. She said this presented a personal obstacle she found necessary to overcome.

"I had to stop using other people's definitions of myself," she said. "I had to define myself."

A graduate of Dartmouth College and Dickinson School of Law, Wharton stressed the importance of overcoming barriers to obtaining one's goals, whether they be religious, racial, or academic.

"Say you're going to get there ... and you will be there," she said. "I haven't done anything more than anyone else. I just imagined myself where I wanted to be, and I was."

Although she has practiced law in the past, Wharton said she plans to teach. "Law can teach you things . . . but my place is in the classroom," she said.

DOD head says USSR still a threat to the West

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Soviet Union is modernizing its armed forces and still poses a "major threat" to Western security despite President Mikhail Gorbachev's promised cutbacks and pledges of reform, says Secretary of Defense Dick Cheney.

Cheney, releasing the Pentagon's eighth annual assessment of Soviet military strength yesterday, sounded a note of caution amid the sweeping changes in the U.S. Soviet relationship.

"While the United States encourages the evolution of . . . a Soviet Union dedicated to democratic principles, we cannot react unilaterally to Soviet initiatives that are not yet implemented or to proposals which, if implemented, can easily be reversed," Cheney said in the study, "Soviet Military Power."

"It is . . . clear that despite the dramatic changes occurring in the Soviet Union and the Soviet leadership's declaration of benign intentions toward western democracies, Soviet military capabilities continue to constitute a major threat to our security," Cheney said in an introduction to the report.

The Soviet Union, the secretary asserted, "continues to upgrade its forces and improve its capabilities.

"Indeed, while some Soviet military unites and equipment have been withdrawn from Eastern Europe, the Soviet Union will remain the world's largest military power, even if the General Secretary's promised unilateral reductions take place," Cheney said.

The annual study, which in its early editions under the Reagan administration was derided on Capitol Hill and outside government as a propaganda effort, had evolved into a more comparative summary of the U.S.-Soviet military balance. It even acknowledges that the West leads its arch rival in areas such as naval power.

But with a 159-page array of high-gloss text, pictures and graphs, the study portrays the Soviets as an extremely formidable foe facing a United States that "grapples" with such things as the selection of a mobile missile force.

Saying the likelihood for conflict between the superpowers "is as low as it has been at any time in the postwar era," the book discusses such developments as Gorbachev's announcement of significant cuts in conventional forces, reductions in the Soviet defense budget and weapons procurement, and the U.S.-Soviet arms control agreement on banning intermediate range missiles in Europe.

If the Soviet leader's economic reforms are enacted without corresponding democratic growth, "the West could face a far more formidable Soviet threat than it does today," the study states.

● Despite Gorbachev's announced 14.2 percent reduction in Soviet defense spending, spending since 1965 has increased by an average of 3 percent a year in real terms, while U.S. spending has declined in real terms by more than 11 percent in the same period.

● The Soviets are modernizing offensive strategic nuclear forces at an "extraordinary momentum."

● The Soviet field 170 SS-25 road mobile missiles and 10 rail mobile SS-10s while the United States "grapples with the selection of a mobile missile force."

● The Soviets have augmented their strategic ballistic missile submarine force by launching the sixth units of the Typhoon and Delta IV-class submarines.

EEC offers aid to Poland, Hungary

AP photo

BRUSSELS (AP) — The European Community's leadership is proposing $648 million in new aid for Poland and Hungary, money it says is urgently needed so that economic instability does not threaten the countries' reforms.

Wrapping up a daylong meeting of 24 major communist donor nations on ways to encourage democratic reform in Eastern Europe, senior EEC officials also urged that Poland and Hungary work out agreements with the International Monetary Fund to reschedule their foreign debts.

Hungary's debt is the highest per capita in the East bloc at $18 billion and Poland owes a debilitating $35 billion.

Tuesday marked the second time the 24 nations have met to discuss aid to Eastern Europe and they are scheduled to meet again in November. The first meeting was held Aug. 1.

A communique issued at the end of the meeting noted that non-communist nations have already pledged $271 million in food aid to Poland and Hungary.

Of the $648 million in aid for next year, half would be financed by the 12 European Community member nations and the remainder by the 12 other donor nations. All donor nations and the European Parliament must approve the proposals.

The U.S. delegation did not pledge more aid than the $169 million already promised but indicated it could find additional funds. It also said the $648 million should be seen as a minimum account, not a ceiling.

Jacques Delors, president of the European Community's external relations commissioner, said the economic and political reforms in Poland and Hungary were "still very fragile."

In a statement, they said Poles and Hungarians "could well find their new freedoms threatened by economic disorders."

The non-EC donor nations are the six members of the European Free Trade Association — Austria, Finland, Iceland, Norway, Sweden and Switzerland — Japan, the United States, Canada, New Zealand, and Turkey.

Johannesburg opens all public facilities to Blacks

JOHANNESBURG (AP) — Johannesburg formally opened all public facilities to Blacks today after the city council voted to desegregate buses, swimming pools and recreation centers.

The move was approved at a city council meeting Tuesday night despite strong opposition from members of the far-right Conservative Party who favor strict segregation.

"We are taking a large step in South African terms," said council member Harold Rudolph, who voted in favor of integration.

Most public facilities in major cities have been desegregated in recent years, either informally or by the repeal of apartheid legislation.

Ten killed, 11 injured in sightseeing plane crash

TUSAYAN, Ariz. (AP) — A sightseeing plane crashed into a wooded hill near the Grand Canyon Airport yesterday, killing 10 people and injuring the other 11 aboard.

The aircraft's wings were sheared off by tall Ponderosa pines, but some passengers survived because the fuselage of the de Havilland Twin Otter remained largely intact, said Sheriff Joe Richards. The two crew members were killed, he said.

National Park Service Ranger Paul Crawford, who was among the first to reach the wreckage, said some of the passengers were walking around when he arrived at the scene on a small ridge about 300 yards east of a runway.

"They were shellshocked. They had that empty, dazed look," he said.

The twin-engine Grand Canyon Airlines plane went down at 9:49 a.m., said Federal Aviation Administration spokeswoman Elly Brekke.

Ms. Brekke said the plane hit trees, flipped over and crashed after veering on its landing approach. Elizabeth Seibold, co-owner of Grand Canyon Airlines, said from Las Vegas that the plane was on a sightseeing flight and was coming in for a landing.

Seibold said all those aboard were Americans.

The airport is located about five miles south of the Grand Canyon. The injured were being taken by ambulance, airplane and helicopter to the Flagstaff Medical Center about 75 miles away.

Hospital spokeswoman Laurin Bosse said the condition of the injured who had arrived ranged from serious to critical, with lacerations, fractures and head wounds.

The identities of the dead and injured were not immediately available.

Larry Nickey, a Grand Canyon National Park Fire Department captain, said there was fuel in the plane's cockpit area but the wreckage did not catch fire. "It's just good luck that we didn't have a fire," Richards said.

A . . . choo! I need relief

It's that time of year again.

Your nose has that irritating itchy feeling.

Your throat is scratchy.

Your ears (on the inside) feel itchy, red and irritated.

And you are sneezing simultaneously with your breathing.

Minu Sebastian

Sound familiar? It does if you are an allergy sufferer. Here's a typical day in the life of an allergy sufferer:

I wake up in the morning with itchy eyes, a congested nose and head. I get up and go into the bathroom and blow my nose, hoping that somehow it will be blown out of my system. No such luck.

I get in the shower and in between shampoo and conditioner intervals, I start sneezing uncontrollably.

I get out of the shower, grab my towel and hide my face in it. Somehow I think that by shielding my face, I will stop sneezing. (By doing this I actually intensify my allergies because of the dust in a towel.)

Now that I am feeling much better (ha, ha), I start brushing my teeth. At this moment my eyes are watering, my throat is itchy, and my nose has that incredibly, irritating itchy feeling. I start to sneeze again. Trying to pace my sneezing while spitting globs of toothpaste is not an easy task.

Finally, the sneezing seems to slow down. I then get dressed as quickly as possible, so as to beat my next attack. Not to my surprise, a few minutes later my sneezing starts up again. But that is not the worst of it. The unbearable itchy feeling in my nose has intensified, making me think of drastic methods to try and stop it.

At this point, I would love to scratch my nasal passages. The thought totally disgusts me, so let's move on.

I could cut off my nose and hope and pray that a new and improved, allergy-free one would grow back.

I also could use a more practical method: I could try holding my nose for a few minutes. This makes breathing a more difficult task; having to breathe through my mouth takes too much concentration.

But instead, being the sensible person that I am, I choose an alternate method. I take two tissues and place one up each nostril. I put them in lightly so I can still maintain a normal breathing pattern. It's really a pretty site.

I also thought of retreating into a plastic bubble, but sitting alone would be not too exciting for me. I do not think I could handle it.

All of these measures are, of course, desperate and should be used with caution. Cutting your nose off could do more harm than good.

What can we, as allergy-diseased individuals, do to get some "real" relief? There are many forms of relief offered to us.

For congestion, throat pain, and headaches, and other allergy symptoms, some products include: Sudafed, Sudafed Sinus, Sudafed Sinus formula, Sudafed Sinus Extra Strength formula, Actifed, Benadryl and Dristan just to name a few.

It sounds great — just take a couple of tablets, and almost instantly, your symptoms will disappear. But there's one catch.

These tablets could cause drowsiness.

The plastic bubble is looking better and better.

Clearly the last one is the oddball. But there are certain people in the world who would like to lead you to believe that they all go together, because they have a misconception about Coca-Cola and its relationship with South Africa.

It has been rumored that Coca-Cola indirectly supports apartheid by continuing to do business in South Africa. This is the common belief, and is the reason why people are trying to "educate" us and ban Coca-Cola from our campuses.

Last Saturday, students at Mount Holyoke College protested in front of the school's administration building, claiming that the school reneged on its deal to remove all Coke machines from campus. In April, a student referendum temporarily banned Coca-Cola from campus, but never permanently.

Proponents of the movement argue that by getting Coca-Cola to pull out, it would send a message to the South African government and to other corporations with holdings there. That may be an easy request to make from afar. But let's check some facts.

In October 1986, Coca-Cola agreed to search for Black investors for their bottling plant. By March 1987, Coke made the announcement that it was selling one-third of its shares in the bottling plant, and that 60 percent of the potential shareholders would be minorities (Black, Indian or other racial mix), making it the first United States company to sell shares directly to Blacks.

What is even more interesting is that, at that time, Blacks bought more than 75 percent of all Coke sold in the nation, good for $225 million in revenues. Which means that the Blacks who owned the shares in the bottling company were making money off it.

Now obviously, Coca-Cola is not the only company doing business in South Africa. Big enterprises like IBM, Ford and General Motors are all located there, and have all been asked to withdraw as well. But they were reluctant, citing that a complete withdrawal would harm the Black workers in their companies. When GM announced in 1986 that it was divesting, hundreds of Black workers, fearing their jobs, staged a sit-in at the plant.

Even funnier is the fact that South Africa exports 75 percent of the world's non-Communist gold. Yet, we still wear gold jewelry. But of course, that's a necessity in life, right?

The point is, if we were to protest everything that has any economic tie to South Africa at all, we'd be sitting out in the cold, naked and starving to death.

Which brings us back to the singling-out of Coke. When Mount Holyoke tried to ban Coke in the spring, it brought about a response from a spokesman for the Coca-Cola headquarters in Atlanta, who in turn quoted a letter sent to him by one Archbishop Desmond Tutu, the leader of the whole anti-apartheid movement.

In the letter, Tutu was quoted as saying "I am sorry to hear that Coca-Cola is running into some trouble over its alleged dishonesty about the manner of its disinvestment from South Africa, and that is being accused of aiding and abetting the apartheid regime. Nothing could be further from the truth."

Tutu concluded his letter by saying "It is easy to sound more radical from the safe and comfortable distance of 10,000 miles than those who bear the brunt of the viciousness of the apartheid machinery close at hand."

Well, if it's good enough for him, it's good enough for me. Have a Coke and a smile.

" THEY SNORTED THE GOAL LINE!"

What kind of junk mail did the government send today?

I got a lot of mail today.

In fact, I get lots of mail everyday. Some of it's important, some of it's junk, some of of it's threatening . . . most of it's bills. But it just seems like today I got an extraordinary amount of mail.

Cosmo Macero Jr.

Let's take a look:

- One check for $1.19 from the Safety Insurance Company in Boston.
- A bill from American Express for $119.
- A letter from the Bursar's Office at Whitmore . . . probably just junk mail.
- Ah . . . my Publishers Clearing House Sweepstakes entry form. This ought to be good. Wow, I can win a million dollars, and a 20 piece dinette set.
- Hey, what's this? A letter from the Department of the Air Force. My uncle was in the Air Force. Guess I'll open it . . .

"Dear Mr. Cosmo,

I wrote you last summer — as we kicked off Project FORECAST 55 — requesting your assistance in generating ideas for high-leverage or emerging technologies and systems concepts which would allow major improvements in the future Air Force's warfighting capabilities . . . " (I don't remember reading about this last summer).

"We have identified 70 ideas for further investigation . . . we need your help to insure that the identified ideas receive the proper attention." (They need my help?)

"I thank you for your assistance, and know that you will continue to help in maintaining the Air Force's technological edge.

Sincerely,

Lawrence A. Skantze
General, USAF
Commander

Wow, what a weird piece of mail.

It must be some kind of joke.

Or probably just junk mail.

Maybe they sent it to me by mistake. How am I supposed to remember if the Air Force contacted me last summer? Or the summer before that? Or even three summers ago?

It's not like I don't read my mail. I read all my mail, my important mail especially. I think I would definitely consider mail from the Air Force important.

I bet the Air Force sent this to me by mistake. Yeah, that's it. They don't even know my last name. I wonder who they meant to send it to?

Let's see . . . Cosmo, Cogswell, Cosby, Colby . . . hmmmm . . . Collins, Coffee . . . Conti . . . oh well, who cares?

What life is to me

A thousand cultures, ten thousand languages, a million ways of life. Billions of us on this revolving sphere, following an endless number of paths. Our differences reach infinity. Yet with all our complexity and variation, we celebrate one human truth. We share one thing. All skins, all breeds, all titles, all creeds, all mortals, all homes, all flesh, all bone. We share life! In this world of endless smaller worlds, we still share in the living of life.

Josh Galitsky

It can be as frightening as a nightmare that stabs at your courage with fear and leaves your confidence for dead.

It can be as peaceful as watching a sunset melt colors into the horizon.

It can be as confusing as a spell of deja-vu that flashes you from what you've known to be reality.

It can be as beautiful as the face of someone you love, the shimmering of their eyes, or the intimacy of their smile.

It can be as mysterious as the future which lives hazily in our heads hazy and plays itself out, an unpredictable fate.

It can be as calming as burying your head within a loved one's bosom and being held until the world is hushed.

It can be as frenzied as the raging city, the bustling highway, or some frantic stock exchange.

It can be as wicked as rape and war and murder.

It can be as exciting as making love, with all its expression and passion and magic.

It can be as draining as the endless whirlpool of thoughts that buzz within our heads and pose questions that cannot be answered.

It can be as joyous as the celebration of laughter or the quiet sharing of a smile.

It can be as unjust as hatred spread under the name of bigotry.

It can be as inspiring as the handicapped person who accepts her/himself and rejects the pity of others.

It can be as terrifying as the fear of death.

It can be as moving as the world of the Arts, which grace us with theater, art, dance, poetry, music and the endless other entities that touch on who and what we are.

It can be as painful as the loss of a loved one, an abyss that defies all understanding.

It can be as tranquil as a body in good health, treated with the respect and care as of a temple.

It can be as boring as the routines and rituals we implant to ground us and maintain order in our existence.

It can be as triumphant as the Olympian who ignores the stinging of their limitations and reaches beyond them.

It can be as isolating as the individual who gives in to the hell of loneliness.

It can be as rewarding as the person who finds their significance in being needed by another.

It can be as challenging as the intellect that observes it.
It can be as creative as the creatures who cherish it.
It can be as uncontrollable as the events that shape it.
It can be as remarkable as the forces that preserve it.
It can be as evil as the people who endanger it.
It is as fragile as faith.

It is as constant as change.

It is life.

In three words, I can sum up everything I've learned about life. It goes on.

Notes from the Basement

Hey, did all you coffee drinkers know that the bleach used on coffee filters contains dioxin? It is bad enough that we drink coffee, but the way I look at it, dioxin is not something I want to pour directly in my system in big amounts. So just so you know there are unbleached (i.e. brown) filters to be found out there.

Peter Leon

Just so you know, the Collegian offices have been taken over. This is not a military take over, it's a sit-in, though most everyone is standing. Phil McNamara of UVC is probably responsible — reading the Collegian on the news verbatim doesn't tow the line anymore.

Actually it is just some unorganized (sorta) concerned students. They are demanding two things: a) David R. Mark's resignation and b) the return of the Black Affairs page. Let's look at these issues.

The resignation of David is called for because he wrote what has been called a racist anti-Palestinian column (Sept. 19). Well, that is open to interpretation. He could be racist or just have written a poor column. Either way, though, he has a right to his beliefs, and a right to express them as anyone else, even if he is editor in chief.

That he accepted the position does not mean he has forfeited his rights as a citizen of the United States.

This right has been proven over and over. When the Nazi party of America wanted to hold a meeting in Chicago, and the locals tried to stop them, the Nazis hired a Jewish lawyer. He defended them simply because he believed in everyone's civil rights. Basically it comes down to silencing one person and it becomes all too easy to silence another.

This week's quote: "In Germany, they came first for the communists, and I didn't speak up because I wasn't a communist. Then they came for the Jews and I didn't speak up because I wasn't a Jew. They came for the trade-unionists and I didn't speak up because I wasn't a trade-unionist. Then they came for the Catholics and I didn't speak up because I was a Protestant. Then they came for me and by that time no one was left to speak."

—Pastor Martin Niemoller.

The return of Black Affairs is a much more sensitive issue. I have had the pleasure (and pain) to be a staff member since Sept. 1987. My first memory of the Black Affairs page was Matt Bigg as editor. He wasn't from UMass, nor from Massachusetts, nor from the States. He was from England. I used to talk with him a great deal as to why he had such a hard time finding reporters for his page. He used to respond by saying that the Black community feels alienated from the Collegian, and also there is just a great deal of apathy.

From the horse's mouth. Now I would hope that if the Black community is feeling alienated, they would meet with us to help solve these problems. As to their apathy, I can do nothing about it. I encourage them to get involved in any and all endeavors, including the Collegian.

The other and more important reason is that we, the Collegian, have been guilty of not focusing on the other minorities of campus. It was only recently that I learned there are about 300 Puerto Ricans on campus. That is a lot of people considering it is an Island in the Carribean. The Multicultural Affairs page was proposed years ago and now is being implemented to EXPAND, not narrow the Collegian's coverage of minority affairs.

Thus, till next week, Amherst, get the facts and then judge.

Standing up for others is not a crime

". . . and the Congressmen who join these committees are usually the elder, more powerful people . . ."

Again with the men, I raise my hand.

"Excuse me, Professor Peters, but could you say Congress*people*?"

I hear a few exasperated sighs from the back as Professor Peters corrects himself, "Ahh yes, excuse me, Congresspeople who join these committees . . ."

The class continues without much else of note, and the subtle sexism Mr. Peters had disappears, at least for today.

Danny Cohen

After class I turn to go, noticing the woman in front of me is also walking the same way I am. I ask her if she minds Mr. Peters' constant, though probably unintentional use of the male version of words like Congressmen.

"Well I have only been hearing Congressman for so long, that I guess I am used to it by now," she replies.

I don't respond, feeling angry that just because you have heard something all your life does not mean you cannot change it.

Lost in my thoughts, I do not notice two people waiting outside, apparently for me. One of the two was a tall guy who seemed to have a chip on his shoulder.

Since he did not give me his name, I will call him Bozo.

"Do women like you find Mr. Peters offensive?" asks Bozo.

This was an odd comment, considering that I am male.

So I ask Bozo if he is implying that only a woman should stick up for women's rights and because I said something to Prof. Peters, I must be a woman.

Bozo calls me something I would not print and basically continues to insult me.

I ask him why he is doing this. He responds "Because I feel like it."

Apparently, a man is not allowed to stand up for women's rights and if he does he is a wimp — according to Bozo, that is.

I ask him why he is being so hostile, and he tells me that if I don't shut up he will " . . . knock all my teeth down my throat . . ."

Hmmm. I see.

Apparently he does like women's rights so much that he is willing to cause bodily harm to anyone who speaks out.

Well, no matter, I am not afraid of Bozo; I never did like my teeth anyway.

What bothers me, however, is I am trying to do a good thing, but people like Bozo feel threatened in some way.

Now Bozo's tiny brain cannot think in terms of how, by being a White male he holds some power in this world, instead all he thinks is that kid in the fourth row is a wimp.

Why? Doesn't he see that if we don't all work together we will fall apart? I don't know.

Ironically, I want to know.

I have to know. I must find out what makes him think the way he does, because if I do learn how he comes to his conclusions, I might find a way to change them.

For whatever reason, I try to give everybody a second chance, because if I can change Bozo's views on women, the world has one less oppressive person to worry about.

If I fail, well, I guess I'll be gumming my food for a while.

Third World Caucus has had enough abuse

Ever since I've been a member of the Third World Caucus, I have spent my time fighting for rights that were once ours.

We had to fight in the Student Senate to protect Caucus' representation. For the rest of that year, conservative senators tried to stop the appointment of Caucus senators. We again had to fight while we watched senatorial appointments from area governments go through without any problem. While we were put on the defensive to work at something that had already been ours, the area governments went along with their programming.

Adam Stein

The Caucus grew in other directions. We programmed, organized and refused to be put on the defensive, only to be told that we were neglecting our job in the Senate.

Now this campus' African-American community is being put on the defensive. It is as if the system is rigged to prevent non- majority groups form making any proactive changes because they are stuck fighting for what they already had. Can the African- American community work toward increasing their retention rate?

How can they when they have to fight the power to gain back control of the Malcolm X cultural center?

The New Africa House was fought for 1970, not in 1988. Then the community was put again on the defensive and had to fight in 1988. Couldn't the energy of that fight have been used to cover new ground?

It was supposedly a cultural center again. Last semester, the Cape Verdian Student Alliance held a cultural festival, and on other nights, the Black Mass Communications Project sponsored the gathering of many people from a common cultural background.

Now, after much time has been spent organizing these past few days, the administration is keeping the New Africa House open 'til 10:00. Neither the Cape Verdian Student Alliance nor the BMCP event ended by 10:00. Hell, people didn't even start showing up 'til 11:30.

The problem is, this campus is set up through the eyes of the majority. If the New Africa House closes at 10:00, and the SUB closes at 2:00 a.m., where are people going to be able to hang out and satisfy their cultural needs?

Did I forget to mention that cultural center in Southwest? Yeah, that's right, the one where cultural gatherings are held. Yup, the one where Kwanza was celebrated last year. Well, the doors were recored this summer.

The African-American students who had been running it all during last year can't even get in it anymore! Are they putting the community on the defensive again? Last week, how many classes did you miss while dealing with this baloney?

Stop making the non-majority communities of this campus retrace their accomplishments. Give them back their Malcolm X center, and keep the New Africa House the way it was. Maybe the original New Africa House takeover shouldn't have ended 'til the deed of the building and land was signed over.

DOMINO'S PIZZA®

In 1988, Domino's Pizza founder, Tom Monaghan, made a personal donation of $50,000 to the Michigan Committee to End Tax Funded Abortion. The committee was formed to support a referendum on the November, 1988, ballot. The referendum was passed by voters, and essentially banned use of tax money for abortions.

The donation was made with Mr. Monaghan's personal funds, not with Domino's Pizza, Inc. money.

The donation was made to the Michigan committee, not Operation Rescue, as has been rumored. Domino's Pizza has never contributed money to the group known as Operation Rescue.

Domino's Pizza does not contribute any amount of money from each pizza sold to any political or religious organization.

With the boycott of Domino's Pizza stores, independent owner/operators and employees are being unfairly involved in the issue. While Domino's Pizza franchisees agree to live up to certain business practices and standards, they are not, and have never been asked to agree with any ideological or political views.

Domino's Pizza's 800 franchisees are responsible for more than 120,000 employees nationwide, and hold many different views of the reproductive rights issue.

Finally, we value the student customers of the 5-college area. We hope that now that you have the facts about this issue, you will continue to give us the opportunity to deliver to you the finest pizza in Western Massachusetts.

ARTS & LIVING

Two jazz giants to appear at the Iron Horse

By BILL ROSENBLATT
Collegian Staff

The jazz concert scene is (finally) beginning to heat up around here. As part of its "Giants of Jazz" series, the Iron Horse in Northampton is presenting two very worthwhile shows: pianist/vocalist Mose Allison this Saturday night, and trumpeter Freddie Hubbard next Tuesday night. Both artists will perform two shows, at 7 and 10 p.m.

Hubbard is the better-known of the two, but Mose Allison is no less worth seeing. If you read "pianist/vocalist" and conjure up the image of a refugee from a Holiday Inn cocktail lounge, don't worry: Allison is far more substantial than that. He has quietly carved out a niche as a uniquely American musician. His style mixes the emotional directness of country blues with the harmonic and rhythmic complexity of bebop. As he succinctly refers to it on his latest album, Ever Since the World Ended, he is "mixin' up the boogie with the do-see-do." His relaxed, southern-drawl vocal style is a virtual definition of "laid back," and his piano playing filters classic boogie-woogie through Thelonious Monk and Erroll Garner.

Yet Allison is not some kind of rustic primitive. His lyrics are often wryly philosophical, as in his songs "Lessons in Living" and his retort to inattentive audiences, "Your Mind Is on Vacation (and you mouth is working overtime)." In addition to his own songs, a typical Allison set is likely to include classic blues tunes like Sonny Boy Williamson's "Eyesight to the Blind" and jazz standards by Duke Ellington or Charlie Parker.

Allison enjoyed an initial popularity in the early 1960's among the beatnik set. He slumped later in that decade, since his understated style was not exactly compatible with the more out-front avant-garde and fusion developments of the time. However, he resurfaced in the 70's, thanks to a number of well-known blues and rock acts who had covered his songs (most notably the Who with their incendiary version of his "Young Man Blues."). He has retained a modicum of popularity ever since.
Any of his several fine live albums make good introductions to his music.

Valley Jazz

While Allison is an underexposed figure, Freddie Hubbard is a jazz legend. His reputation as a trumpeter is eclipsed nowadays only by Miles Davis and Wynton Marsalis. Davis and Marsalis receive much more media hype than Hubbard (partially because of their public feuding), but Hubbard has been more consistent. He started out in the early 60s as part of that University of Hard Bop, Art Blakey's Jazz Messengers. He is just one of a list of trumpet giants who played in that band — others include Clifford Brown, Lee Morgan and Marsalis. After his Messengers stint, he recorded several solid albums for Blue Note (Breaking Point and Goin' Up among them) and branched out into avant-garde territory with such artists as Eric Dolphy and John Coltrane. He finished out the 60s by proceeding down a predictable path into fusion.

Hubbard's triumphant mid-70s comeback with Herbie Hancock's V.S.O.P. band, documented on the 1977 album V.S.O.P.: The Quintet, reunited him with acoustic jazz. Ever since then, he has been leading — like Hancock — a dual musical life: half acoustic hard bop, half electronic fusion. In fact, one of his recent albums (Battlescar Gallorica) contains one side of each.

His trumpet sound is heavily influenced by the masters who came before him, particularly Fats Navarro and Clifford Brown. That, coupled with his musical schizophrenia, has led many to conclude that Hubbard "has no style." One club owner has countered that by saying "Freddie Hubbard could be the best trumpet player in the world. What's wrong with that for an identity?" It's hard to argue.

Exhibit shows photographs as art

By W.J.GEORGIADES
Collegian Staff

Is photography art? If this is one of the many questions of earth shattering importance rolling around in your head, then go to the Herter Gallery between now and November 3rd. Once there, you will receive absolute proof that photography is indeed art; that photography can grab you, affect you and hold you as much as any writing, painting or performance (et. al.).

A lot of people get turned off from the art of photography, not only because of the technical nature of the medium, but also because of all the pretentious little twits who think that a photo of their girlfriend's breasts or their boyfriend looking pensively at the sky is art. Then again, pretentious little twits permeate every art form, every activity for that matter, even journalism.

Fantasies, Fables & Fabrications : Photo Works from the 1980s is the title of the show currently on exhibition at the Herter Art Gallery. It was concieved at UMass by Trevor Richardson and Michael Coblyn. After it's run at UMass, the show will go on a tour including venues in Missouri, Western and Eastern Europe. The show is also being planned for President Bush's U.S.-Soviet Exchange Initiative for shows in the Soviet Union.

Trevor Richardson said that "while the work is made up of photographs, all the contributors would consider themselves to be artists." He continued by saying that "the use to which artists have put the camera, and the way they have played with the photographs is used as an artistic tool."

This fact is more than evident from the names of the artists involved, including the ever-brilliant (at least in terms of colors used) David Hockney, who only started using cameras to create art this decade. Other artists include Peter Hutchinson and Silvia Kolbowski (see picture on left). An interesting note is that photographs by one Duane Michals, featuring breasts, will not be complimenting this article due to its "offensive nature." This piece of art is also to be seen all over campus on the posters advertising the show.

"We feel this is a good representation of photography as art,"said Richardson. The 53 photographs by 31 artists is organized around the theme of objecthood and is a response to the "increased use of photography by visual artists."

Cliff turns sit-down hall into a huge jam fest

By KENDRA PRATT
Collegian Correspondent

Jimmy Cliff
John M. Greene Hall
Tuesday, Sept. 26

Reggae musician Jimmy Cliff kept an audience of about one thousand jamming in step with his progressive political messages at John M. Greene Hall Tuesday night.

"I am not a politician, but a musician with a mission," said Cliff.

He and his seven-man band played several tracks off Cliff's most recent album, Images, along with many of his past reggae hits.

Cliff opened with a cover of "By the Rivers of Babylon" mixed with his song "The Originator." By the time he was halfway through his next song, "Soar Like an Eagle," the party had started as the music brought back summer for one last time.

The physical limitations of John M. Greene Hall were superceded by the positive vibes of Jimmy Cliff. No one seemed to care they were in a sit-down hall during "We Are the One."

Cliff dedicated his next two songs, "Reggae Down Arpartheid" and "Pressure," to Winnie Mandela and the freedom fighters in Africa.

"If we keep up the pressure and keep making music, we can fight down the oppressors," Cliff said.

He called upon the audience to save the young people today from the growing drug problems in his next song, "Treat the Youths Right."

In the next song, "You Are My Rub-A-Dub Girl," Cliff left the stage momentarily while his band members took turns as emcee, performing Jamaican dance hall hits.

Cliff then played two songs from his new album Images, the first release from his newly formed independent label, Cliff Records.

Before singing "Save Our Planet Earth," Cliff gave his opinion on the condition of our environment. He said "There are two kinds of people. There are people who want to destroy the planet Earth, and those who want to save it. I'm one of those who wants to save it."

For the encore, Cliff returned alone on keyboards to perform a gentle ballad off his new album, "Rebel In Me." His band then joined him for "Sitting In Limbo."

Cliff finished a knockout performance with "The Harder They Come, The Harder They Fall."

Cassleberry-Dupree opened the show, setting a precedent of musical excellence.

Vais to play in Noho

By DAKKAN ABBE
Collegian Correspondent

For the first time in over 15 years, Sheehan's Cafe in Northampton will host a solo acoustic show in their downstairs venue. The man filling that auspicious role is none other than UMass sophomore, Ari Vais.

Vais is well known to UMass as a regular at the Hatch. He's taking his acoustic guitar to Sheehan's tonight, to play his large repertoire of original songs and unusual covers.

"It's my first paying gig," said Vais. "I played in a lot of clubs in Los Angeles this summer, but I never got paid."

Vais was also selling his self-produced demo tape, Aging Well, at all of his shows. He said that he basically broke even for the summer. He certainly wasn't the typical LA club act.

"Heavy metal rules in LA," he noted. "I didn't like the scene there at all. Everything's fake Guns n' Roses."

Being a solo acoustic act helped separate Vais from the

Muses throw you tornado

Fresh off their tour with REM, the Boston-based band Throwing Muses will be performing an 18 and over show at Pearl Street in Northampton this evening.

Throwing Muses first took shape back in the early 80s, when lead singer Kristin Hersh and childhood friend Tanya Donelly, taught each other to play guitar at the age of fourteen. While both attending college in Boston, the two began performing on the burgeoning Boston/Providence club scene, joined by bassist/cellist Leslie Langston, and percussionist David Narcizo.

Through extensive touring in and around the Boston/Providence area, the band earned a fervent following, which led the British independent label 4AD (known for signing such acts as the Cocteau Twins, and another now well-known Boston band, the Pixies) to sign them in early 1986. Throwing Muses became the first American band to be signed on 4AD, and with the release of their self-titled debut album came much critical acclaim, especially in Britain, where they were named one of the best new bands of 1986 by New Musical Express.

Following their debut album, Throwing Muses released an EP, Chains Changed, on 4AD, and were included on the 4AD Lonely is an Eyesore LP and video compilation. Incidentally, their video earned them an American Film Institute grant, which in turn financed a ten-minute audio/visual clip entitled "Soul Soldier."

The above accomplishments brought the band the national recognition they deserved, and in mid-1987, they were signed to Sire Records, where they released their first major label debut The Fat Skier, again to unanimous critical acclaim.

This lead to the release of House Tornado in the spring of 1988, whereupon the band began an extended stint of international touring until the fall of the same year, when they entered the studio to work on the album that would eventually become Hunkpapa.

Hunkpapa, whose title pays tribute to the band's enduring interest in Native American culture, presents a clear display of the band's diverse musical talents. Although somewhat more accessible than the band's previous efforts, it still offers an example of the band's melodically intricate musical style.

Founder Kristin Hersh explains "The music we've done prior to this has been complex, with lots of countermelody and interplay. The rule of thumb this time out was to cut everything in half, and then cut that in half. We wanted to purify, not simplify, to give the music space and the listener an opportunity to get inside the sound."

rest of the crowd. "I didn't make any money, but I got a lot of really good exposure, which was definitely very good."

It wasn't the first time Vais had been to Los Angeles. In 1978, his family emigrated from the Soviet Union to the United States, and it was in LA that he first lived. He quickly picked up English, and now speaks both Russian and English fluently and with no accent. But it was more than just our language that had a big effect on him — Ari also heard rock 'n' roll for the first time in his life, and he began playing guitar at the age of 9.

When he was 11, his family moved to Brookline, Massachusetts, and Ari started listening to heavy metal.

"I don't listen to that stuff anymore, but I still think Ozzy Ozbourne is incredible."

Tonight will be the last time for a while that Vais will play by himself. In about two weeks, he will be playing with his new band at the Hatch. Made up of a second guitarist, drummer and Daisy Aronian on bass, Ari is very excited about the band.

"It's going to be a much harder sound, kind of like The Police or The Clash. A strong reggae beat and all my originals. We're gonna be doing George Gershwin's "Foggy Day." We've been playing together a lot and the sound is really good."

Eason out, Flutie in at QB for Pats

FOXBORO (AP) — New England quarterback Tony Eason fought more than the opposing team each Sunday. He also had to overcome the fans' favoritism for his primary backups.

Yesterday, Eason became the backup.

"It's very difficult for anybody to come into a situation where you're constantly compared with Steve Grogan in terms of toughness and Doug Flutie in terms of popularity," Patriots General Manager Patrick Sullivan said. "If he weren't dealing with those two legends that he's dealing with, then I think it would be a lot easier for him."

After the Patriots lost their last two games, dropping their record to 1-2, coach Raymond Berry announced yesterday that Eason would be benched. Berry named Flutie, the 1984 Heisman Trophy winner from Boston College, the starter for Sunday's game at Buffalo and promoted Grogan, a 15-year veteran, to second-string.

Eason was booed by home fans during a 24-10 loss to Miami two Sundays ago and a 24-3 loss to Seattle last Sunday. He wasn't the only Patriot who played poorly and, wide receiver Cedric Jones said, "they made Tony the scapegoat."

After Eason played only six games the last two seasons because of injuries, Berry named him the starter early in the off-season. Then the coach gave him just three games this year to prove he deserved the position.

"We had to do something to change the atmosphere that existed around here that was not very conducive to winning," Sullivan said.

While he and Berry emphasized that the decision to switch quarterbacks was Berry's, the fans may have contributed to it.

Their enmity for Eason, the 1983 first-round draft choice who led the Patriots to the 1986 Super Bowl, and their love for Flutie "I'm sure . . . has something to do with it," Eason said.

"It's a unique situation," he added. "But I knew that coming in. I knew I'd have to play pretty well, flawless ball . . . It's the environment and it's a unique situation. It's not like this everywhere."

Flutie said he sympathized when he heard Eason being booed, especially because he knew the fans' desire to see him play contributed to that reaction.

"You want to crawl under the bench and hide or go up to him [Eason] and say you're sorry," Flutie said.

"When I'm on the field at Foxboro and the people are as supportive as they are, it's the greatest feeling in the world," he added. "That's why it's so tough for Tony. I can't imagine what he's going through."

Wide receiver Irving Fryar agreed that Eason was unjustly criticized.

"He's never done anything to anybody. I don't know why they don't like him," Fryar said. "A lot's been on his mind and it's hard, man, it's hard to be in this league and to be booed and to be not liked and to still walk around and keep your head up."

Can Eason ever be an effective quarterback for the Patriots again?

"Ability-wise I can," Eason said, "but, as you all know, there are a lot of things that go into that."

Celts sign three

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Celtics have intensified their search for more help in the backcourt by signing free agent guards Scooter Barry and Charles Smith along with free agent forward Dave Popson.

Boston recently lost second-year guard Brian Shaw, who signed to play basketball in Italy.

Barry, 6-foot-4, was a member of Kansas' 1988 NCAA championship team. He shot 52.3 percent as a senior.

The 6-foot-1 Smith played four years under John Thompson at Georgetown University, averaging 18.7 points his senior year. Smith was also a member of the 1988 US Olympic basketball team.

Popson, who graduated from North Carolina in 1987, played 17 games with the Los Angeles Clippers and Miami Heat last season. The 6-foot-10 forward was originally drafted by the Detroit Pistons.

UMass tennis teams get split decisions

• Minutewomen fall to Providence College

By C.J. ABATI
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's tennis team was defeated by Providence College, 8-1 yesterday afternoon at the Upper Boyden Courts.

UMass gets back into action this afternoon, traveling to Fairfield for a 3 p.m. match.

"There were several long competitive points," UMass coach Edwin Gentzler said of yesterday's match. "We were close, but not over the hump. They were more experienced at the top and bottom than we were. They had seniors playing against our freshmen."

The only match of the day that UMass won was by number four singles player Kere Eddy. She easily won both sets, 6-4, 6-1. Other players that performed well but did not win were Elysa Rosenberg and the second doubles tandem of Shizuko Yamasaki and Vanessa Kershner.

"In general we got whipped," Gentzler said. "It was closer than the overall score showed. We lost some individual matches by some close scores. Some of our girls lost by a few points. Our number five singles lost by a score of 6-4, 6-4."

Gentzler felt that the Friars were on a higher level than his team going into yesterday's match.

"They are very competitive," he said. "They are a little ahead of us. With some work we will be right there with them."

To get a true indication, Gentzler compared his team's performance against Hartford, its only win, to that of Providence.

"They beat Hartford 9-0, and we beat Hartford 5-4," he said. "So we have a long way to go."

Gentzler hopes his team will be more capable of challenging Providence when the two teams meet again during the spring season.

"We play them again in the spring, and I'm looking forward to it," Gentzler said. "As I said before, we are not that far from them. They are a good team, they were very impressive."

Meanwhile Gentzler can look for a rebound today against Fairfield.

"I really don't know much about them," he said. "I do know that they lost to Hartford. We should be a little stronger than they are, but it will be close. I'm hoping for a win. I don't expect any problems."

• Men pick up big win at Boston University

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's tennis team came from behind to defeat Boston University, 5-3 yesterday afternoon in Boston.

"This is a good win," said UMass coach Manny Roberts. "It's the first time we've beaten BU in five years."

UMass was coming off another big win in the ECAC Tournament in Albany, NY this past weekend, but had dropped a tough match to Central Connecticut on Monday. With this win, UMass improves to 3-1 on the year.

The key match came at number six singles, where senior Chris Johnson rallied to take a tough three-set victory from the Terriers' Kurt Salloux. The Minutemen had already lost three of the first five singles matches.

Johnson dropped the first set, 3-6 before picking up a big win in the second set, forcing a tiebreaker which he eventually won, 7-5. Johnson then took the third set and the match, 6-4.

As he was playing, the second and third doubles teams were each helping to clinch the victory. The second pair of Barry Wadsworth and Paul Audet swept to a 6-4, 6-4 win, while the number three tandem of Rich Stone and Jeff Hechemy gritted out a 6-4, 2-6, 6-3 win to seal the match.

Because of the duration of his singles match, Johnson and number one doubles partner Lloyd Teitelbaum never got their doubles match underway.

"He [Johnson] had gone inside to warm up. It was cold and windy down here," Roberts said. "So we didn't bother to bring him back out."

In singles action, Wadsworth took the opening match at first singles, sweeping to a 7-6 (7-1), 6-2 win. BU swept the second through fourth spots, with Art Motares beating Audet, 6-3, 6-0 and Lee Grimes besting Hechemy, 6-3, 6-1. Stone dropped his match at No. 4, 6-4, 6-4.

Teitelbaum brought the Minutemen back with his win at fifth singles over Pat Gonneili, 6-2, 6-1, setting up Johnson's climactic victory.

By ADRIENNE MATT
Collegian Staff

The Univeristy of Massachusetts men's soccer team will meet up with Northeastern University today at 4 p.m. on Upper Boyden Field.

Northeastern (0-4) has not been a threat to UMass in previous seasons, but the fact that neither team has won a game yet will demonstrate which is the more eager.

Not only are the Huskies winless, but they have yet to score a goal this year as well. Northeastern began its season with a 2-0 loss to Iona, then proceeded to lose to Fairfield University in a 1-0 overtime match. More gooseeggs were to come as the University of Maine shut out the Huskies 6-0, then Merrimack College took their turn Tuesday in a 2-0 game.

Co-captain Joel Bellardo was the Huskies' leading scorer last year. This senior forward has yet to prove himself as a formidable force on the squad.

Senior sweeper Pat Cavanagh is Northeastern's other co-captain. Senior goalkeeper John Halasz has started for the Huskies every game this year. After playing second fiddle last season, he has contributed to this year's defense with 46 saves in four games.

"Looking at Northeastern's season, with no wins, it's an excuse for us to come out flat again," said head coach Jeff Gettler. "Either [the team] is going to be mentally prepared or they're not.

"We need to focus on our style of play," Gettler said. "We need to play the way we're capable of."

Senior Jon Gruber will be starting in the Minutemen's goal as freshman Steve Armenti desperately needs to rest after yesterday's collision with a Yale player. Gettler is looking to start Armenti in the Massachusetts Challenge Cup Tournament this weekend. The Minutemen's first opponent will be George Washington this Saturday, while Boston University and Delaware will meet in the other match.

Junior Peter McEvoy will also sit out this game to rest his head and his ankle. He, too, is expected to play this weekend in the Tournament. Again, there will be considerable changes in the lineup for the Minutemen. However, at press time, they were not disclosed.

"Our mental preparedness and attitude will be the issues against Northeastern," said Gettler. "The pressure will be self-imposed and if we're prepared for this match, we can expect results."

Minutemen lose two more starters

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts football team continues to be hampered by injuries, as it was learned that two more starters are out for the season.

Junior guard Paul Mayberry and senior defensive tackle Steve Brothers were each trying to come back from injuries suffered last season. Mayberry underwent surgery on his knee and missed most of the 1988 campaign, while Brothers hurt his shoulder in the season-ending 28-17 loss to Eastern Kentucky in the NCAA Division I-AA playoffs.

Both were given the OK to play this season. Brothers, who was still suffering from shoulder problems, had been playing with his arm in a harness. But both players aggravated their injuries in Saturday's 40-23 loss to the University of Maine in Orono, Maine.

The Minutemen have already lost starting offensive tackle Paul Connor, who suffered a herniated disc in his back during the off-season, and starting defensive tackle John Creamer, who dislocated his knee in the season opener against James Madison three weeks ago.

Creamer is expected to return soon. But in the meantime, junior Rich Kane is scheduled to get his first start at right defensive tackle Saturday when the Minutemen travel to Boston University for a key Yankee Conference match-up.

More news from the local M*A*S*H unit: One of the stranger injuries of the year occurred prior to Saturday's game, and could have had a direct effect on the outcome.

Kicker/punter Marco Gabrielli was practicing punting into the kicking net on the sidelines, when a gale wind blew the net over onto his kicking (right) leg.

"I knew things weren't going to be great when I looked at Marco, and he was limping," UMass coach Jim Reid said after Saturday's loss. "His leg was bleeding and it was all swelled up. I asked him, 'can you play,' and he said he was all right."

Gabrielli did play, but a couple of poor punts set the Black Bears up for two touchdowns in the first five minutes. His first effort was blocked, and Maine tailback Carl Smith scored on a 28-yard run on the next play. Then Gabrielli felt a heavy rush again and shanked a kick into the strong wind that went just six yards. Maine scored on that drive as well, putting the Minutemen into a hole from which they couldn't crawl out.

But if you think UMass has it tough . . .: This week's opponent, Boston University, has lost more than its first three games of the season.

After the team's second loss, a heartbreaking 20-19 setback at West Chester, linebacker and co-captain Dennis Carson took objection to the harsh words used by an assistant coach in criticizing a player in the locker room after the game.

"Come on, we get the point," Carson said to the coach, which was pretty much the final straw in a stormy relationship between Carson and the Terrier coaching staff. BU coach Chris Palmer later suspended Carson for the season.

BU is also without linebacker John Holland and defensive end Chenault Bethea, both starters who are out with injuries.

And, BU has lost all three of its games by a total of nine points, including consecutive one-point losses to West Chester and Dartmouth (28-27 on Saturday).

Spikers fall to Brown, 3-0

Ford promises changes

By DAN SARAZEN
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts volleyball team was swept by Brown University, 3-0 Tuesday night, and is still oh-for-the season, which has been seven matches.

Head coach Carol Ford is none too happy about the current situation and has planned a few changes that she hopes will get the Minutewomen's juices flowing.

"I'm working on a new lineup." Ford said in a telephone interview. "There have been too many breakdowns in our system, so I'm making some changes."

The first change will be moving Julieta Santiago back to middle. "She's not a big block but she's quicker than our freshmen." said Ford. Moving to the outside will be Rachel Bredimere.

The second change will be a switch from their 5-1 offense to a 6-2. Ann Swartz will see more time as a setter along side Kelly Ramsey. The new formation will help Ramsey in that she will not be the only setter for the team on the floor.

"Kelly will not be setting all the way around." explained Ford.

UMass has two games at home this weekend and there will be very little time to effect the changes.

"We are struggling," Ford said, "and right now I don't think we have anything to lose."

Student, wife injured after project explodes

By BETH GATELY
Collegian Staff

A post-doctoral student was injured Wednesday night when the project he was working on, involving a nerve gas, exploded in a chemistry laboratory on the 14th floor of the Graduate Research Tower, police said.

Ismail M. Yusef was held overnight for observation at Cooley Dickinson Hospital, Northampton, and released yesterday afternoon, a hospital spokeswoman said yesterday.

The student was condensing phosgene gas from liquid pressure form into a solvent and in the process, excessive pressure caused the glass container to rupture, said James Fox, hazardous waste management officer for the Division of Environmental Health and Safety.

"It was not a chemical reaction that triggered the small explosion, but a problem related to too much pressure," Fox said.

EHS, the University of Massachusetts Police and the Amherst Fire Department responded and evacuated the building for a little more than one hour.

"Damage was insignificant," Fox said. "There was some broken glass that had to be cleaned up."

Dr. Arthur Hilson, executive director of the department of public safety, said Yusef and his wife, who was also in the lab, went to University Health Services after the accident and were later transferred by ambulance to Cooley Dickinson Hospital.

Hilson said the Yusef's wife was checked by doctors to determine if she had inhaled any vapors.

Fox said the gas can damage the respiratory system, fatally if an excessive amount is inhaled.

The glass was under a fume-hood, a protective cabinet used when hazardous materials are involved, Fox said. A small amount of glass escaped from the cabinet, emitting toxic vapors into the air, he said.

Duffey: tuition hike may follow future budget cuts

By LISA ROSSI
Collegian Correspondent

Students may face an additional tuition hike if the state approves another budget reduction, Chancellor Joseph Duffey said yesterday at the Professional Association of the University of Massachusetts at Amherst's first meeting of the semester.

PAUMA represents professional staff members who work on or through the UMass campus in the same manner that the Faculty Senate represents the faculty, said Gerald A. Quarles, PAUMA senate chair and a member of the executive board.

Lower-than-anticipated state revenues over the past two months prompted L. Edward Lashman, state secretary for Administration and Finance, to issue a memo two weeks ago requesting all state agencies to prepare for a five percent budget cutback.

Duffey has refused to submit a plan, but said yesterday that a tuition hike — cushioned by scholarships for needy students — may become necessary in the future.

"We can't have good higher education if you keep cutting taxes while keeping the tuition the same," he said. "I don't think this campus can stand greater cuts."

Duffey stressed the need to examine the tuition policy because of the substantial number of students who can afford to pay an increased rate.

"It isn't fair to say lower tuition for some when others can afford to pay more," he said.

Duffey commended the University for its early planning efforts to combat the cutbacks, which began two years ago. Mandatory fees, which now appear on every students' bill, are among the effects of the cutbacks.

"We are fortunate to have those fees in place because they've given us carry-over with which to be flexible," Duffey said.

He said he is looking at a proposal to establish a biannual budget instead of requiring administrators to plan a budget for each fiscal year.

In response to PAUMA members' questions concerning how they could improve the budget situation, Duffey urged them to communicate to state legislators and the University's Board of Trustees.

"The legislature needs to have more of a sense of what effect the budget cuts are having on campus," he said.

Quarles said PAUMA invited the chancellor to deliver the keynote speech to open communication between the group and the administration.

"PAUMA is a creature of the Board of Trustees," he said. He explained that this communication is necessary because if the chancellor makes recommendations the association doesn't agree with, their only recourse is through UMass President David Knapp.

"Joe Duffey is a fairly reasonable person as far as chancellors go and there is usually no reason to bypass him," Quarles said.

Study says 'hyper-segregation' causes isolation among Blacks

From the Associated Press

CHICAGO — Various forms of segregation that isolate Blacks in major cities, depriving them of opportunities and resources, are creating a separate society of underachievers, researchers say.

The authors of a study released this summer by the University of Chicago call such multi-layer discrimination "hyper-segregation."

Professors Douglas Massey and Nancy Denton say they found that hyper-segregation exists in 10 cities, and that those cities account for 29 percent of the country's urban Black population. Chicago was found to be the most hyper-segregated city.

"There is a small set of cities in the United States where Blacks' experience more extreme segregation than believed in the past," said Massey, a professor of sociology and director of the school's Population Research Center.

"While the cities are small in number, they house a relatively large percentage of Blacks."

In the study — published in today's editions of Demography, the Journal of Washington-based Population Association of America — Massey and Denton focused on five measures of segregations:

- The degree to which neighborhood percentages of minority-group residents correspond to the city-wide minority percentages.
- The degree of potential contact between whites and members of the minority groups where the latter live and work.
- The extent to which minority neighborhoods are clustered.
- The degree to which minorities are settled in and around the city center.

Bracey: discrimination will end after increased political power

By ROB SIMPSON
Collegian Staff

In major cities, discrimination against Blacks in housing, education, and the workplace tend to contribute to each other, creating a cycle difficult to escape from, John Bracey Jr., professor of Afro-American Studies, said yesterday.

"They all reinforce each other," he said.

He said a Black person forced to live in a poor area in a major city because of discrimination would probably receive a lesser education, leading to a lack of credentials for a potential jobs. Being forced into the low income job would lead to low income housing, and so on, he said, creating a cycle of discrimination.

Bracey said for Blacks, the key to curbing discrimination in major cities is political power.

"All you have to do is be the person in charge," he said.

He said the emergence of Blacks on the political scene in some major cities is helpful in bringing about change for blacks in those cities, citing Mayor Andrew Young of Atlanta, Mayor Tom Bradley of Los Angeles, and New York mayoral candidate David Dinkins.

As mayors of these cities, Blacks can "console the machinery of the government of the city," Bracey said. He said since a mayor's administrators tend to serve what they think are the interests of the mayor, a Black mayor would create an attitude beneficial to Blacks.

Candidates upset with 'need' for new election

By NATHAN KRYSTALL
Collegian Staff

Undergraduate Student Senate candidates for the Commuter Area were dismayed yesterday at the nullification of the Commuter Area elections. Meanwhile, the new senate elections have been scheduled for next Tuesday.

New elections are scheduled for the Commuter, Southwest South, Southwest North and Greek areas. The senate voted Wednesday night to nullify these areas' elections due to procedural errors in the elections, originally held Monday.

Thirty-two students calling themselves the Commuter Progressive Coalition were elected to the 32 Commuter Area senate positions, sweeping the area by a decisive margin.

Coalition member Charles Lenchner said the elections should not be held again.

"Since we won by a huge landslide and the since the [Commuter] voter turnout was the highest it's been in recent years, we shouldn't have to run again," Lenchner said.

Coalition member Alan Ditmore, who was elected to the Commuter Area, said the elections were nullified for political reasons.

"I see a pattern, beginning with Silkoff/Rabinowitz, of anti-progressive electoral manipulation," Ditmore said. "A pattern that says progressive electoral victories are unacceptable and will be nullified by the senate."

Last fall the student senate refused to ratify the Student Government Association co-presidency of Jason Rabinowitz and Shari Silkoff, claiming that the SGA constitution was ambiguous on whether co-presidents are allowed to hold office. Rabinowitz was a member of the Young Communist League.

Student Speaker John Dunlap said the decision to nullify the elections was not made in an effort to keep the coalition members out of the senate but was instead an attempt to reform the senate process.

"It's very unfortunate that this was their introduction to the senate," Dunlap said. "I'm sorry they have such a lack of trust in me and the senate that they understand this as a conspiracy rather than an attempt to better the democratic process for this campus."

Student Attorney-General Robert Fadel also said the elections are being re-run because of an attempt by the senate to reform itself, not because of partisan politics.

"I believe there will be a hesitancy for many new senators to trust the establishment of the student government," said Fadel. "But I think they'll overcome that when they see what the student government is trying to achieve."

CAG hopes to soon offer advocate to aid students with tenant rights

By KATHERINE T. LAMOTHE
Collegian Staff

The Commuter Area Government hopes to offer in the near future an advocate for student tenants facing hearings with the Amherst rent review board.

The advocate would fill a void created when the Legal Service Office lost their litigation powers in August, 1986, said Brian-James Crawford, member of the CAG Governing Board.

"Because Legal Services is no longer able to advocate for students, either in court or in rent review," Crawford said, "we [decided to] hire an advocate."

The Housing Review Board was created in 1986 to deal with tenant-landlord disputes, particularly those involving "unfairly" high rents.

In the past, Crawford said, the landlords have charged tenants for water and sewage use, illegal under state law.

Crawford said the advocate would be a graduate student and work 20 to 30 hours per week, earning about $1,400 a semester, if the governing board's proposal to hire the assistant is approved.

The CAG would pay the advocate's salary, he said.

Crawford said the proposal had been put on the agenda at the governing board's last meeting Tuesday, but quorum was not sufficient to begin the meeting.

He said the idea of hiring an advocate was discussed last spring and submitted to the Student Government Association's summer budgets committee. The committee later turned down the request.

Crawford said it now may become a reality, because the government won't be dipping into the Undergraduate Student Senate's coffers.

"Now that we don't have to appeal to them, we're going to do it ourselves," he said.

Crawford said although the review board was designed for tenants to discuss their grievances without the representation of an attorney, the availability of an advocate may encourage tenants to attend the hearing when they may not otherwise go by themselves.

"Most students don't know they can get around [the unfair charges]," Crawford said. "That's what the board's for."

This five foot by four foot sculptural telephone by Antony Zito is just one of several sculptures on display in the Sculpture Courtyard at the Tower Library.

Art combines fantasy, history

BY KERRY HERLIHY
and PAUL D'AGOSTINO
Collegian Staff

The next time you look at the Sculpture Courtyard on the main floor of the University of Massachusetts' Tower Library you'll probably see a giant telephone.

And you won't be hallucinating.

The telephone is part of a sculpture installation project sponsored by the UMass Arts Council. The five-sculpture project, which will be on view through late March, 1990, in the courtyard, is displaying the work of five undergraduate and graduate students.

Majorie Tuttle, director of the UMass Arts Council, said that the students were picked from an open competition. All five received an honorary fee to compensate for transporting and assembling their work in the courtyard.

The works are distinct and show the individuality of each artist, said Karen Dolmanisth, one of the artists whose work was chosen to be exhibited at the display.

Joseph Davidson, who was also chosen as an exhibitor for the showing, sculpted a piece titled "Blind Man's Zone." The work is a simple skeletal creation that "goes far beyond the original object."

His creation, which is composed of scrap metals, is unique because he was able to "transcend the materialism of the object," he said.

Davidson said, "It is nice to observe my work in an exhibit as opposed to my front yard."

Deborah Bazer, an undergraduate contributor to the show, has produced a sculpture titled, "Norse Creation Myth" which is based on folklore stories about the creation of the world.

Bazer said although she put a lot of work into the piece, she was surprised that she was chosen by the Arts Council.

"This is a wonderful feeling," she said. "This piece allowed me to learn about [the Nordic] culture through the mythology and realize how similar people are."

Only one artist, Laura Rothage, contributed two sculptures to the show. Her two pieces, titled 'Totem" and "Monolith" are inspired by ancient architecture and civilization.

Rothage, who studied art for two years in Paris, is a senior working toward a degree in studio art. She spent about two weeks on each sculpture. She said the pieces were easy to make but the challenge was to make them durable enough to withstand the New England cold.

The artist responsible for the telephone is Antony Zito whose piece is titled, "The Wheel." Zito said phones are often the subject of his work.

"This piece is about technology and how it will affect our world. It may be getting out of control and consume everyone," he said.

UMass students slated to join Caravan

Solidarity with striking mine workers to be this weekend

By PAUL MORRIS
Collegian Staff

Four University of Massachusetts students will drive through the night tonight to southwestern Virginia as part of the Solidarity Caravan, with the goal of supporting some 1,500 striking coal miners and their families.

Janice Kissinger, a member of the Organization for Marxist Studies and one of the four students preparing for the trip, said the miners at the Pittston Company's gigantic coal preparation plant worked without a contract for about a year before walking off the job April 5.

"There are workers and their families trying to survive," she said. "Coal mining is the most dangerous job you can have.

These people have worked a long time for their medical benefits and job security, now the company is trying to take it all away."

Jason Rabinowitz, a UMass graduate now with the Young Communist League, New York, said that on Sept. 17, 98 members of the United Mine Workers of America and a minister sprinted past guards and entered the plant.

The miners escorted 13 non-union members, two security guards and a boss out of the plant, then sat down.

"A U.S. district court judge ordered them to leave," he said. "On Sept. 20 they were led out by UMWA vice president Cecil Roberts and greeted outside by 4,000 supporters," he said.

Rabinowitz said hundreds of state police and private security are patrolling the plant. Federal courts have jailed thousands and assessed fines on the union which add up to more than the national debt, he said.

He said the company wants to change from full health coverage to a plan where the worker pays 20 percent, require a 24-hour advance for all safety inspections and have the right to subcontract jobs to non-union workers.

Kissinger said she will drive three other students to Lebanon, Va., where they will camp with union auto workers, farmers, Eastern Airlines employees and other students Saturday night. They will go to the coal plant in nearby Carbo, Va., on Saturday and Sunday.

She said the Young Communist League at UMass has been collecting donations of canned food at local supermarkets, which she will give to the strikers' families.

The Graduate Student Union also donated $100, she said.

Providence College, Brown University, Providence, R.I., the University of Rhode Island, Kingston, R.I., Rutgers University, New Brunswick, N.J., Howard University, Washington, D.C., Iowa State, Ames, Ia., and several New York City colleges will also be sending supporters, Kissinger said.

FacSen to distribute letter to UMass

'Emergency' statement shows concern over effect of budget cuts

By NATHAN KRYSTALL
Collegian Staff

The Faculty Senate will soon be distributing what they call an emergency fiscal letter to the University of Massachusetts community, as concerns mount about the effects of budget cuts on the University.

The letter will be distributed to faculty, staff, students, parents and alumni of the University, said Professor Frank Hugus, secretary of the Faculty Senate. Hugus said faculty are encouraged to discuss the letter and the issues with their students.

A signature sheet will be attached to the letter for faculty and librarians to sign, Hugus said. The letter and signatures will probably be sent to Gov. Dukakis, he said.

"We hope to get the signatures of as many faculty and librarians as possible to underscore how deep their concern goes," Hugus said.

The letter, written by the Faculty Senate rules Committee, states that the University's "promise for tomorrow is being blighted by a lack of foresight today."

It lists a number of negative effects the cuts have had: including cancelled classes, overcrowded classes and a reduction in University programs and basic services.

Professor Haluk Derin, a rules committee member, said he hopes the letter will be making a strong statement by the faculty that the University is endangered by the fiscal cuts.

"The University is a very sensitive institution," said Derin, a professor of computer and electrical engineering. "The adverse effects of these cuts will be felt for years to come —unless the trend is reversed immediately."

Derin said the University might be facing more cuts in the near future and he hopes the letter will help prevent further cuts from occurring.

"We hope we'll be able to convince [the state legislature] not to go ahead with more cuts," Derin said.

Marcos, 72, dies in exile

HONOLULU (AP) — Ferdinand E. Marcos, former president of the Philippines, died yesterday, ending in exile a life that took him to the pinnacles of power and notoriety in his impoverished land. He was 72.

Corzaon Aquino, who came to power in the 1986 uprising that drove Marcos from office, refused again to allow his burial in the Philippines for the sake of 'tranquility of the state and the order of society.'

Marcos died at 12:40 a.m. (6:40 a.m. EDT), said Eugene Tiwanak, spokesman at St. Francis Medical Center, where the former president had been hospitalized for nearly 10 months with kidney, lung and heart ailments, pneumonia and bacteria infections.

At 1:17 a.m., Marcos's son, Ferdinand Jr., emerged from the hospital room and announced his father had been taken to 'a higher place.'

"Hopefully friends and detractors alike will look beyond the man to see what he stood for - his vision, his compassion and his total love of country." the younger Marcos said. He said no funeral arrangements have been made.

"Father's not here anymore. He's gone." Marcos' widow, Imelda, told about two dozen supporters outside the hospital room, said family spokesman Roger Peyuan.

The canny, combative politician, who governed at times as a democrat, at times as a dictator, was driven from the presidency in 1986, after which he settled into exile in Honolulu at a hillside estate overlooking the Pacific.

Marcos died without facing trial on U.S. criminal charges he plundered the Philippine treasury during his two decades in power.

President Bush, who during a trip to Manila in 1981 praised Marcos and his government for 'your adherence to democratic principles,' said today he was saddened to hear of Marcos' death and offered his condolences to the family.

NYNEX rejects latest IBEW union proposal

BOSTON (AP) – The first informal bargaining in two weeks between striking telephone workers and New England Telephone Co. began and ended Thursday when company officials rejected a new union proposal.

Union officials presented a proposal in which they scaled back their wage increase demands to a four percent increase for first year workers and a one percent increase for second and third year workers in addition to cost of living adjustments, said officials for the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

New England Telephone spokesman Peter Cronin was not immediately available for comment Thursday.

After the company rejected the proposal, union members requested a meeting over the weekend. A date has not yet been set.

The strike against NYNEX, the parent company of New England Telephone, in New York and New England has gone eight weeks. More than 40,000 workers are on strike. It has produced consumer complaints, allegations of widespread vandalism, and little movement on the main issue – the cost of health care.

NYNEX has insisted that its workers assume as much as $1,500 a year in health costs.

DWI victims' kin sue Florida for negligence

CLEARWATER, Fla (AP) – Relatives of six Massachusetts tourists, who were killed when a drunken driver struck them as they fished from a bridge, are suing the state.

The suits filed Tuesday in Pinellas Circuit Court accuse the state Department of Transportation of negligence for letting people use the causeway and not warning them of danger.

They also accuse DOT of failing to provide an adequate shoulder on the road and adequate barrier between traffic and the walkway. The tourists were killed Nov. 18 1985, when Richard Thornton Hayes drove his speeding vehicle into the group at a popular fishing spot on the Tom Stuart Causeway Bridge on Madeira Beach.

The car knocked Benedetta Magro, 39, to the ground, killing her. Her unborn child was surgically delivered but died within hours.

The victims were: Mrs. Magro and her husband, Gianfranco, 45, of Medford, Mass.; James Meloni, 50, and his wife Evelyn, 40, of Medford, Mass.; their son, Richard, 28, and his wife Linda, 33, of Malden. Mass.

In Manila, senior military commanders met, but there was no sign of extraordinary security of any pro-Marcos demonstrations. One Marcos supporter, Oliver Lozano, said loyalists will stage a symbolic funeral march, but he did not say when.

Marcos had been hospitalized three times since December, lapsing in and out of critical condition. The family had instructed doctors to take every measure to save his life, and life-support equipment was not turned off until after death, Peyuan said.

Doctors would not comment on Marcos' death, but a hospital source speaking on condition of anonymity said it the culmination of a "slow and steady" deterioration. Doctors had implanted a pacemaker on Wednesday.

Peyuan said Marcos' son arrived from California just in time to see his father alive one last time. Peyuan said Marcos was given cardiopulmonary resuscitation with his wife, son and Mrs. Marcos' sister in the room. He said the three remained there after his death, saying a rosary.

Peyuan said Marcos opened his eyes briefly about 30 minutes before his death. "I think he wanted one last look at his son," the spokesman said.

Of Mrs. Marcos, Peyuan said, "She is holding up with great dignity. They were still hoping to give him a more dignified end."

Mrs. Aquino, who in May rejected appeals from Mrs. Marcos that he be buried on Philippine soil, again said no after Vice President Salvador Laurel asked her to reconsider.

"In the interest of the safety of those who will take the death of Mr. Marcos in widely and passionately conflicting ways, and for the tranquility of the state and the order of society, the remains of Ferdinand E. Marcos will not be allowed to be brought to our country until such time as the government, be it under this administration or the succeeding one, shall otherwise decide," Mrs. Aquino said in a statement.

Mrs. Marcos said in April she would embalm her husband's body and display it in Hawaii until she could return and scatter his ashes to "fertilize" the Philippines.

MOURNING A LOSS – Friends and family wait outside Reynolds Army Community Hospital at Fort Sill following an artillery accident that left at least three soldiers dead late Wednesday afternoon. At least 23 other soldiers were injured when an artillery round overshot the target, Army officials said.

Dems: tax cut helps rich

But House still passes Bush tax plan

WASHINGTON (AP) – The House Wednesday approved President Bush's proposed cut in capital-gains taxes, rejecting arguments of Democratic leaders that it would buy a windfall for the rich at the expense of a bigger budget deficit.

A nearly solid bloc of Republicans – only Doug Bereuter of Nebraska defected – was joined by 64 Democrats, chiefly from timber and farm areas, in the 239-190 vote to redeem Bush's campaign promise to tax investment income at a lower rate than wages.

The tax reduction, said House Republican Leader Robert H. Michel of Illinois, "fits well with the economic and tax policies which have guided this nation through 82 record moths of growth, creating hundreds of thousands of new, productive and lasting jobs in our nation."

Majority Leader Richard Gephardt, D-Mo., called the plan "a $250,000-a-year tax cut on average to 375,000 American families – the wealthiest families in America – for some decision they already made – not for something they might do in the future."

Rep. Marty Russo, D-Ill., called it "outright, disgusting greed."

Bush said in a statement that he was "very pleased" with the bipartisan vote, saying it represents " a step forward for economic growth, new jobs and American competetiveness."

"A lower capital gains rate will reduce the cost of capital and create incentives for investment in the long-term productive capacity of American industry," he said.

The joint Committee on Taxation estimates the proposal would cut taxes for 8 million couples and individuals, with 80 percent of the benefit going to those with total yearly incomes above $100,000.

Those making less than $50,000 a year would get cuts averaging $15 a year.

Restoring a lower tax rate for capital gains would reverse a major part of the 1986 tax overhaul, generally recognized as the biggest domestic achievement of the Reagan administration. That law cut tax rates across the board, but ended special treatment for capital gains and reduced or ended such deductions as state sales taxes and Individual Retirement Account.

The Intifada still thrives

Recently questions have been raised about the progress and future of the Palestinian uprising (Intifada). Some believe that the uprising is coming to an end. The price paid by Palestinians under occupation has been high but the achievements of their Intifada are impressive. It has had a profound effect on the Palestinian national movement by forcing the hand of the PLO, whose recognition of Israel and unilateral declaration of independence in November 1988 were a reaction to the Intifada.

Hussein Ibish

Fatah, in particular, can no longer take its leadership role for granted and is compelled to behave in an increasingly responsible manner to satisfy its newly empowered constituents.

The note from Chairman Arafat, circulated throughout Gaza at the last weekend urging restraint, determination and non-violence, exemplified responsibility and maturity.

The Intifada has resulted in a redefinition of the US/Palestinian relationship in a positive manner for the Palestinian people and for prospects of peace. It has exposed to the world the ruthlessness of the Israeli occupation and the expansionist and particularist policies that it defends. In the process, the international image of "the Palestinian" has been partially recast to reflect the realities of the stateless people.

More telling still is the effect of the Intifada on Israeli society, which can no longer ignore the situation, forcing it to consider the moral dilemma of occupation and the starkness of their nation's options.

The status quo being recognized as untenable, three basic options seem open: An eventual withdrawal from most or all of the territories, forgoing the dream of Greater Israel; expelling or permanently subjugating the Palestinians in an "apartheid state;" and full annexation of the territories and its population thus risking the "Arabization" of Israel and the emergence of a bi-national state.

None of these options seem compatible with the kind of Zionism that dominates Israeli society. Nonetheless, the Intifada has forced the people of Israel to confront this conundrum and debate the very nature of the state.

This debate can be observed in the current split in the government over the "Mubarak Plan" for a Cairo based peace conference. This process of Israel coming to terms with itself and defining its fundamental nature is a necessary prerequisite for a final settlement and has clearly been forced by the uprising.

In the final analysis, the Intifada can be seen not only as the first successful expression of Palestinian nationalism but as a movement that has empowered ordinary people redefining the relevant power relationships. It has created a situation in which scenarios for an eventual peace settlement have become far more plausible than in the past.

Proposition for Sylvan residents

As the elected student leaders of the Sylvan Residential Area, we are are entrusted with responsibility to represent and protect the interests of Sylvan students. Over fifty angry students voiced their concerns at our first Area Government meeting this semester. We must act on their behalf. The policy concerning suite lounges and hallways has been "clarified" to ensure consistency within the area. However, this clarification has resulted in several inconsistencies which we find intolerable.

Since this clarification was implemented without student input, and since Housing doesn't seem concerned with its importance, we propose that the residents of Sylvan participate in a "lock-out," asking residents to lock their suite doors in protest until the inconsistencies are resolved.

Today's talent clearly in danger

We, the faculty at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, must share with you our sense of alarm at the serious impact which repeated funding cuts are having on public education. We see a university whose promise for tomorrow is being blighted by an absence of foresight today.

Now, more than at any other time in the past, the inadequacy of resources threatens to prevent us from fulfilling our educational mission to the Commonwealth. For us to remain silent would be a violation of the trust the people of Massachusetts have placed in us.

We are deeply troubled by what we see each day: classes cancelled, basic services curtailed for want of staff, essential maintenance deferred, too few classes in major departments to allow students to graduate in four years, vacant faculty positions, outreach programs being severely reduced, library hours cut back, drastic reductions in book and journal acquisitions, outmoded laboratories and curtailed escort services.

Such rapidly deteriorating conditions are robbing students of the opportunities that are their right. Should the downward spiral continue, the degrees which our students earn will lose value in the job market.

It is one thing to consume our seed-stock in time of famine. It is quite another to squander it in a moment of folly. It is time for those of us who are charged with educating the young people of the Commonwealth to say, "No more!"

Confronting a hot issue

The issues surrounding the insensitivity of the Collegian editorial staff, mainly the views being presented by the editor in chief David R. Mark, is a hot political topic. As one never afraid to take on controversy, I feel that I must speak my mind. The first issue is that of the Multicultural Affairs section that used to be the Black Affairs page. The Collegian editorial staff received comment on the lack of coverage for various ethnic communities and other social issues. While other non-majority communities have a valid concern, I disagree with the decision to discontinue the Black Affairs page.

Tracy Davis

I suggest to Mark that the Collegian work to include representation of the communities through creating sections specifically designed to cover such issues. The phrase I often use is ghettotizing" non-majority communities.

By creating a section designed to cover issues and concerns of every minority category, you are setting up a situation making the Collegian a paper for majority concerns and a section for those not in the majority category. (P.S. — Thanks for placing concerns of Afro-Americans on the front page for three consecutive days. Is it a sincere attempt or just another form of appeasement? Hard to tell.)

Mark also commented on the lack of staff for the Black Affairs page, citing the inability to locate writers and "dedicated" persons to cover such events. Well . . . take a look at the paper. Ask yourself why aren't non-majority members willing to participate in the Collegian?

I know I would not feel comfortable writing for a paper that constantly portrays certain communities in a negative light. Oh, thanks for correcting yourself the following day. It's one thing to make an oversight but when you continue to make such "mistakes,"it's hard to believe that you are sincere.

When you hire for various positions do you comply with Equal Opportunity Search Guidelines? Advertising in your own paper does not complete a full, non-biased search. Have you tried to reach out with various groups to fulfil your goal of creating a "multicultural" paper?

Outreach constitutes attending a non-majority student organization meeting to discuss ideas you have that may affect their ethnic community and receive input. Outreach constitutes the coverage of issues and events with a fair unbiased opinion. For example, in my speech for the University Student Conference, I never mentioned the word racism. Question — does racism and diversity mean the same thing? No. Realize the difference and contact me later for further discussion.

Without touching the political controversy surrounding the Jewish and Palestinian conflict over Israel, I will attempt to air my views about Mark's editorial. The Editorial page is the one place in a newspaper where authors can be totally biased, alas it's called the Opinion page.

Mark claims to be attempting to make the Collegian a true multicultural paper. How does he think he will accomplish this by making insulting remarks about an ethnic community? As editor in chief, his title represents the views and outlook of the staff. Furthermore, his follow-up "apology" was more insulting than the original column. His sincerity leaves much to be desired.

I know this "editorial" will raise quite a few replies, but I can take it. As a concerned student I will not let it pass.

Behind the Budget Cuts

I am writing to express my concern about what is happening to the University of Massachusetts. Many of you have spent hours waiting in line in vain attempts to get into needed classes; faculty and staff are anxious about our jobs, the quality of life on the campus — even our personal safety — is jeopardized by the recent cuts.

Samuel Bowles

I will be discussing these issues in my Introduction to Political Economy class on Monday October 2nd in Thompson.

I want to begin a dialogue with you about why this is happening and about the long run consequences if these developments go unchallenged.

The capitulation of the State Legislature to business-backed opposition to taxes and the slowing down of the Massachusetts economy have plunged the state's finances into disarray. The result is to compromise the quality and purpose of education at UMass. What is at stake is this: a great public university is one which offers an equal opportunity for learning at the highest level; with each program cut and fee increase UMass is turning away from that ideal.

What is obvious to all is that for a time at least, the University will not only be smaller, but it will be a different university, more dependent on business contributions and military contracts. It will design its programs to appeal for these funds in competition with other institutions, and cost more and offer less to the great majority of students. The door of opportunity will swing closed to those unable to pay and to those with non-traditional backgrounds.

None of this is inevitable; the trends may be challenged but doing this will require some understanding of the underlying forces at work.

In the ebb and flow of educational reform and retrenchment, periods of strong financial support for education alternate with lean years. The bountiful times are often characterized by the autonomy of educational institutions, by an expansive humanistic conception of educational objectives, and partly for this reason by progressive and egalitarian reforms. The late 1960s and early 1970s — which saw the birth of Women's Studies and Afro American Studies departments at universities throughout the United States, the opening of university doors to students from families who had never been to college, and a broadening of students' curricular options — is an example.

Budgetary crisis also promotes restructuring, but with a difference. When funds are short, those with money are in the driver's seat, and "cost effectiveness," not learning, or equal opportunity is the motto of the administrator. Schools and universities compete for the dollars of well-to-do parents, businesses, and other. They do this by offering the monied what they want.

The early 20th century substitution of vocation for general liberal education at the high school level and the closely associated emergence of "objective" testing as a means of sorting and tracking students was adopted by educators under pressure to justify the "cost effectiveness" of their institutions to tax conscious business critics.

A similar process of restructuring is now underway in Massachusetts and the United States. The reduction of federal financial aid and other support for higher education since the early 1980s, and reduced government revenues forced by tax cuts for the wealthy and businesses have resulted in an increasing reliance by universities and colleges on private contributions as well as tuition and fees of students. As universities have tightened their belts, they have come to rely on the Department of Defense as a major source of financial support.

Monday, part two of this column will be run: What's happening to UMass.

PAUMA consists of representatives from administration division areas of the University which include Academic Affairs, Administration and Finance, Chancellor's Area and Common Services, Research and Graduate Studies, Student Affairs, University Relations and Development.

Every professional staff member is automatically a member of PAUMA, except those who hold elective membership in another governance unit, positions of chancellorship or a line administrative position which reports directly to the chancellor, Quarles said.

In other business:

- Duffey said the Early Retirement Incentive Program for faculty and staff on campus is not being dealt with at the state level because of the budget crisis.
- Construction of the Mullins Center is on schedule, Duffey said. The center will house a new hockey arena.

However, Duffey said budget constraints would prevent the center from remaining open if it were to open today.

"It's just one of those embarrassing contradictions," he said.

- Featured speakers for the association's upcoming monthly meetings include Rep. Jack Flood, Rep. Steven D. Pierce and Rep. Shannon O'Brien. Information regarding the association can be obtained through the PAUMA office located at 109 Hampshire House.

- The amount of physical space occupied by a minority group.

Hyper-segregation occurs when at least four of those measures apply, Massey and Denton said.

Using data gathered in 1980 by the U.S. Census Bureau, the researchers used the five measures to compute housing patterns for Blacks and Hispanics in 60 metropolitan areas.

In Chicago, Blacks had an index above .750 on each of the five measures. A reading of .600 is considered high, researchers say.

The study found hyper-segreagtion of Black in nine other cities: Baltimore; Cleveland; Detroit; Gary, Ind.; Los Angeles; Milwaukee; Newark, N.J.; St. Louis; and Philadelphia.

Housing patterns that fall into any one of the five categories are troublesome because they isolate a minority group from amenities, opportunities and resources that affect social and economic well-being, the researchers said.

Language is the best and most sensitive indicator of social isolation and creation of a divergent cultures, Massey said.

"Black English vernacular is becoming more prevalent and almost a separate language," he noted. "It has its own diction and structure, and it is because of isolation. The two groups don't interact. They are not sharing a common language."

The demographics of Blacks and Whites are different, with Blacks having a higher infant mortality rate and a shorter life expectancy, Massey said.

Black child-bearing is concentrated between ages 18 and 25, while Whites generally delay having children until later in life.

"It is like living in two different nations," Massey said.

Hispanics experienced lower degrees of segregation overall.

The differences in treatment of the two minority groups are not easily explained by socioeconomic factors, he said — which leaves racism.

Spike Lee shows how to Do the Right Thing

By ANDRE BUSI
Collegian Staff

The Making of Do The Right Thing* and Joe's Bedstuy Barbershop: We Cut Heads
Pleasant St. Theater

FILM REVIEW

Do the Right Thing is finally playing at the malls in Hadley. If you haven't already seen the movie and have no intention of doing so, then please skip this article and wait for the Collegian's upcoming review of Rambo IV: The Journey Home. If you do want to see this movie, then this is probably your last opportunity to see it besides on the VCR. Which means that unless your television is hooked up to a stereo, you're gonna have to listen to the soundtrack on those dinky TV mono-sound speakers. And as we all know, listening to Public Enemy under those conditions is like trying to appreciate an oil painting when you're colorblind.

Spike Lee does not make movies for the colorblind. If a film's merit can be gauged just in terms of sheer controversy, then Do the Right Thing is definitely the most important movie of 1989. It has sparked every sort of reaction, from being hailed as the only accurate weather report on today's racial climate, to being knocked as well-packaged Afro-Fascism.

There's no question that the film was artful, with its fantastic colors and self-conscious style, hopping between an almost child-like sweetness and violent depictions of tension and hatred; then that ambiguous ending with the half-assed reconciliation between Mookie and Sal and the juxtaposition of quotes by Martin Luther King and Malcolm X about whether or not to smash windows.

Elements like these in an American film relegate Do the Right Thing to the kind of back-handed complimentary status of 'artsy'. But unlike the artsy film that got awarded at the Cannes Film Festival over Do the Right Thing, namely sex, lies, and videotape (a decision that Spike Lee credits to racism), what we're dealing with are serious political overtones, which is why the one-hour feature playing at the Pleasant Street Theater this week, The Making of Do the Right Thing is such a bonus.

It's worth learning about the techniques and intentions of the people behind this movie. Spike Lee has always documented the production of his work in the cause of inspiration for two reasons: firstly his production company is energetic and closely-knit, a model of unity and vision for those filmmakers on their way up; and second, his crew is entirely black, which provides the same model for black professionals in any field (not to mention unity and cooperation). Even the security force he used to to clean up the Bedford-Stuyvesant neighborhood that was shown in the movie was the Fruit of Islam, Minister Louis Farrakhan's personal guard organization.

As part of a double-feature, Joe's Bed-stuy Barbershop: We Cut Heads will also be shown. Joe's Barbershop was Lee's first movie. The one-hour drama was Lee's final project at New York University film school, and it features the sorts of things you'd expect to find in a school film. It's a tragic story about small-time business in the ghetto; kind of like neorealism meets jazz synchronization, if you know what I mean.

Anyway, if you care about where the most groundbreaking director of our day is headed, then this is a rare opportunity to see where he's coming from .

Documentaries show powerful stories on the perils of nuclear war

By ALEXANDRA RAYNOLDS
Collegian Correspondent

Most of us think of documentaries as dull sleeper films about obscure topics that no one but filmmakers and their cronies care about. They are, in fact, food for the intellect that can be as interesting and provocative as a 60 Minutes news program.

In a symposium Wednesday night at the Forbes Library in Northampton, Charles Light and Daniel Keller of Green Mountain Post (GMP) films presented clips of their work and described the art of documentary filmmaking.

The pair, whose films have won numerous awards worldwide, document stories about such controversial issues as Agent Orange and nuclear power.

Keller says that they do what they do to "uncover important issues and make them better known."

Keller and Light are journalists who work in the medium of film, using various journalistic techniques to create their work. Their role is akin to freelance newswriters on long-term assignment, presenting their final story after months of investigative work.

The result of documentary filmmaking can be powerful images crackling with life on screen that cannot be passively scanned as easily as a news article. "The Secret Agent," a GMP film about the use of the dioxin Agent Orange in Vietnam, is one such example. A nuclear explosion on a test site in the Midwest is shown as a mushroom cloud envelopes the dark sky above with a deafening roar.

Next, we see a nuclear power plant site while a young child's voice describes a nuclear leakage scare that caused the evacuation of her school in the middle of the day.

An old film clip shows American soldiers rolling barrels of dioxin off the back of a plane as it flies over the jungleland of Vietnam. A narrator explains American usage of Agent Orange as a pesticide in the war while the American and British scientists who developed it did not yet fully understand how the chemical worked.

This is the way a documentary film presents a story; real people discuss their feelings on the subject at hand while other images on screen inform and provoke reaction from the viewer. It is a method of reporting that is everything but boring, and a great way to learn about important issues.

Pearl St. gives life to band that won't die

By ROBERT FISCHER
Collegian Correspondent

Tonight, The Men They Couldn't Hang will be at Pearl Street in Northampton. The band, formed in 1984, has been thrilling audiences since they first appeared onstage at England's Alternative Country Festival during the same year. Along with bands such as the Pogues, Men are given credit for what now is referred to as "cow punk" or "Celt pop."

The band's personnel consists of guitarist/vocalist Cush, vocalist/guitarist/penny whistler Phill Odgers, drummer Jon Odgers, bassist Ricky McGuire and Paul Simmonds on electric mandolin, electric bazouki, and guitar. Strengthening the sound is Nick McGuire, who plays piano, organ, and accordian.

Considered and enjoyed by fans and critics alike for their creativity, the band is almost as infamous for their lack of success. These boys have paid their dues in an increasingly competitive music arena.

PREVIEW

In the beginning, the band's future looked very promising. They were brought to the attention of Elvis Costello through mutual friend Phil Chevron, founder of the Pogues. Costello liked what he heard and signed Men to his own Imp Label, which resulted in the band's debut album, Night of a Thousand Candles.

The album brought them both artistic and commercial success, as well as a new contract with MCA records. Expectations ran high, and a second album, How Green is the Valley, to be released, and last year, after their biggest tour to date, they put forth their new album, Waiting For Boneparte. Unfortunately, the last two releases were poorly timed as a result of corporate takeovers that diminished their publicity and impact.

Circumstances like these would test the perseverence of most bands, but Men have a will of iron. Men wouldn't die. They continued touring Europe until finally signing with Silvertone. Band member Paul Simmonds said, "All our energy is directed towards building a respectable - or even better - disrespectable career, carved out of a well merited reputation for musical excellence."

Maggot-flies: apple of professor's eye

By SARAH DEMASTER
Collegian Staff
and The Associated Press

At the start of this school year, Ronald Prokopy, professor of entomology at the University of Massachusetts, put out an unusual request: rotten apples for the teacher.

He got a bushel basket full of responses that researchers hope will prove fruitful in their efforts to vanquish the pesky maggot fly, part of a pest management program taking on added importance as Americans become increasingly concerned about the chemicals sprayed onto their food.

Although Prokopy has been studying non-pesticide ways to control the apple-maggot fly for 25 years, research efforts have been intensified with the withdrawal of the chemical Alar, a synthetic plant hormone which keeps apples on the trees.

Concern that Alar might cause cancer sparked an uproar earlier this year, as consumers shunned apples and apple products, frightened by news that children who consume large amounts of apple juice and apple sauce, were at greater risk. Alar is absorbed into the apples and can't be washed off.

While the Environmental Protection Agency did not formally order Alar off the market, it did impose a gradual ban on the substance, which it said was sprayed on only about 5 percent of the nation's crop. The manufacturer of the chemical, formally known as daminozide, subsequently stopped selling it in the United States.

Prokopy said the public's mind has been poisoned as a result of the Alar issue.

"Alar is harmful only in an amount that would kill you before it would cause cancer," he said.

In New England, the loss of Alar means an increase in maggot flies, the scourge of McIntosh growers, Prokopy said. Without Alar to keep them on the tree, the apples drop, providing a breeding ground for the pest, he said.

Prokopy's rotten apples, which are decomposing quietly in a South Deerfield barn, will be harvested for the maggot flies growing within them, providing researchers with a fresh crop of wild flies that have not adjusted to laboratory life, Prokopy said.

Controlling maggot flies that originate in an orchard is virtually impossible, but they can be kept out through an ingenious system of stringing shiny red croquet balls around the orchard, Prokopy said. The balls are smeared with a maggot-attracting scent and a substance researchers refer to as "sticky."

Prokopy said that until researchers know what proportion of flies in the orchard would fly out to the balls to get trapped, growers will have to rely on insecticides to kill them.

The absence of Alar means that growers are losing profits from fallen apples.

"The growers can't afford to pick up all those drops," he said. "The fruit on the tree is worth three or four times more than the fruit on the ground."

David Chandler, owner of Meadow Brook Orchards in Sterling, MA said he has had to hire more men to pick more hours a day to keep up with the crop.

"We can't pick fast enough," he said.

However, he said that the public does not seem to have been discouraged from apple-picking because of the Alar issue.

"If the number of people visiting the orchard has gone down, it's only because of the weather," he said. "On a good fall day, the number of people has been the same."

Meanwhile, Prokopy and his colleagues in the Integrated Pest Management program at the University of Massachusetts continue to look for ways of growing food with less reliance on the increasingly popular pesticides.

However, Prokopy said that there also has to be a great education of the public about the food we eat.

"Most of the foods we eat are healthy," he said. "Nature produces some pesticides naturally."

He added, "We shouldn't be only concerned about human consequences, but the effects on nature as well."

Patients AIDed by price cut

By SARAH DEMASTER
and The Associated Press

RESEARCH TRIANGLE PARK, N.C. — Federal officials praised Burroughs Wellcome Co.'s decision to reduce the wholesale price of AZT by 20 percent, but some AIDS activists say the cut isn't deep enough.

"This is a step in the right direction, but a very small step," says Peter Staley of the New York-based AIDS Coalition to Unleash Power. "It's not enough."

Richard Goldsby, professor of veterinary and animal sciences at the University of Massahusetts, and co-author of a book entitled Thinking AIDS, said he agrees that the reduction is a significant step.

The cost of AZT contains not only the wholesale cost, but the mark-up cost added by pharmacies, which is about 20 percent, he said.

Goldsby said he also agrees that more needs to be done.

"We should not lose sight of the fact that there are other reductions that could be made at the pharmacist's level," he said.

Burroughs Wellcome announced recently that it will lower the wholesale cost of the only federally approved AIDS treatment, citing production efficiencies and research that suggests an increasing demand for the drug.

"The expected growth in patient population, coupled with recent production economies, will reduce somewhat our financial risk and will remove some of the uncertainties which existed when this drug was first introduced," said T.E. Haigler Jr., Burroughs' president and chief executive officer.

The company said, however, it couldn't guarantee that the full savings will be passed on to consumers, who have been paying $7,000 to $8,000 per year for full doses of the drug.

A patient now paying almost $8,000 a year for a high-dose, 12 capsule-a-day prescription of AZT would pay more than $6,500 a year with the lower price. People who are infected with the virus but who have few or no symptoms of AIDS generally have a five-capsules-a-day prescription, and would see their costs reduced to about $2,700 a year.

Louis Sullivan, secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services, said the price cut, combined with recent findings that lower dosages may be effective, will reduce the cost of AZT treatment.

"This is good news for those infected with HIV who can benefit from AZT treatment, and it is good news for the health care system as a whole," Sullivan said.

The cut was announced after mounting protests by AIDS activists against Burroughs Wellcome. Five people recently chained themselves to a banister at the New York Stock Exchange to protest the cost of AZT, also called Retrovir.

Activists argue that some AIDS patients could not afford the drug and that the price discouraged Congress from renewing a program that subsidizes the cost of medicine for patients who cannot afford it.

The medical establishment also criticized prices of AZT and other AIDS drugs in an article published recently in the Journal of the American Medical Association.

In the article, researchers blamed "price gouging by drug companies" for part of the estimated $5 billion annually it may someday cost to care for AIDS victims.

ASK US

So, you think that you know everything about AIDS, but did you know that:

- It is estimated that two out of 1,000 college students are infected with the AIDS virus.
- Natural and animal skin condoms cannot protect against AIDS and other STD's because the microscopic pores will allow viruses to pass through, whereas sperm are too large
- Nonoxynol-9 is currently the only available spermacide that will kill the AIDS virus.
- Condoms are an effective,but not foolproof, way to prevent the spread of AIDS virus.
- Currently the fastest growing population getting AIDS is women in New York City between the ages of 21 to 25, it is the leading cause of death for this age group.

So, you think condoms are boring, ruin the mood, and are in general a nuisance? Here's a way to make them more interesting (or "How to put a condom on with your mouth")

Yes! You can put a condom on with your mouth. For those of you wondering why you would want to put one on orally, it makes oral sex less inhibitive (and fun) given the fact that it is suggested that you use a condom during oral sex in order to prevent the spread of sexually transmitted diseases including AIDS.

Putting a condom on orally is something that definitely takes practice. It also should be done carefully, making sure that the condom is not damaged in the process (hint:teeth).

Weight warnings ignored

By ROBERT BYRD
The Associated Press

ATLANTA — Fat Americans by the millions realize their problem, but more than half aren't really doing much about it, according to a new federal survey of the nation's weight loss efforts.

The national Center for Disease Control estimates that 34 million Americans — about one in four adults — are overweight by 20 percent or more.

Although health officials recommend a twofold weight-loss approach of eating fewer calories and increased physical activity, none of 32 states in the CDC survey could report even half their overweight citizens doing the right thing.

"The data suggest that significant numbers are eating fewer calories, but it's the physical activity that we don't have enough people doing," said Eddas M. Bennett, a CDC surveillance epidemiologist.

In the survey, conducted in 1987 in 32 states and Washington, D.C., an average of 20 percent of the overweight men reported that they were following the fewer calories-more exercise approach. For women, the percentage was somewhat better: 31 percent.

The men's responses ranged from a high of 36 percent in Missouri to a low of 13 percent in Hawaii. For women, the range was from 19 percent in Washington, D.C. to 42 percent in Utah.

Bennett noted that an official 1990 health objective for the nation, set by the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, calls for at least half of overweight adults to cut calories and increase their rate of exercise.

"We're not going to reach that objective in any state," she said.

An average of 44 percent of the overweight men said they were eating fewer calories, compared with 64 percent of overweight women. But only 24 percent of the men and 35 percent of the women said they were increasing their physical activity.

"Physical activity appears to be the limiting factor," the Atlanta-based CDC concluded in its weekly report Thursday. "The low prevalence of lifestyle of U.S. adults and the emphasis on diet as a means of weight loss without adequately addressing the benefits of physical activity."

The survey was a "real straightforward" one, Bennett said. Randomly selected participants were asked about their weight and whether they were eating less or exercising more to try to shed pounds. Scientists believe that in such anonymous surveys, most people are "fairly accurate" about themselves, she said.

More than 10,000 respondents indicated they were overweight.

A Jones in BAD is worth the same as Kate Bush for this Junkie

By JOHN DRUKMAN
Collegian Correspondent

DISC JUNKIE

We here at the Disc Junkie offices are simply falling all over ourselves because the new albums from our favorite artists just keep raining out of the sky onto us. For example, in last week's column we mentioned the imminent arrival of the new Kate Bush album. It transpires that the single is available by semi-legitimate means, and there are already bootleg copies of the entire album circulating. We have our eyes peeled particularly sharply for that last item! In any event, the single has finally landed on our shores, and copies can be had for those willing to travel and search. CBS Alternatives Records, the label on which Ms. Bush is distributed in the U.S. has announced that the U.S. single will be different than the British one, but it won't be here for a few weeks yet. Therefore, bear in mind that what we're talking about is the British release.

It seems appropriate to mention here (for those that don't know) that Kate Bush is a reclusive British songstress whose last few albums have been absolute masterpeices of songwriting and studio technique. Unfortunately, she works excruciatingly slow. The last full album we had from her, not counting The Whole Story which was a greatest hits compilation, was Hounds of Love, and it came out in 1985! The name of the new Kate Bush album, when it finally becomes available (in mid-October) will be The Sensual World, and the first single from it is the title track. The vocals are probably not what you'd expect from Kate, whose operatic range is reputed to span four octaves. She sings in a very restrained style, through most of it, and the lyrics are often hard to hear. The music is a gorgeous Irish arrangement with lots of fiddles, whistles and pipes, mixed with expensive synthesizers and big drums. It's really an odd song, but after a few listens the chorus lodges itself right in your brain and you'll be hooked forever.

The b-side is called "Walk Straight Down the Middle" and it is equally indescribable. Kate cuts loose in her trademark vocal style on this one a bit more, and even gives us a few animal whoops here and there. We here at the Junkie staff room think it sounds kind-of like Peter Gabriel's excellent Security album. This is an exciting taste of an album that probably will be quite successful in the UK. Will it break in America as well? We'll keep you posted.

One thing that you don't have to wait for is the latest release by Big Audio Dynamite. You all know by now that BAD's frontman, Mick Jones, used to be in the Clash, and just recently was hospitalized with severe pneumonia which threatened to kill him! He has made a full recovery (the hospital staff is given a big thank you in the liner notes.), and his world view is unsurprisingly optimistic. He and his BAD crew have produced Megatop Phoenix, presumably paying some sort of lip service to Mick's phoenix-like recovery. The trend in music these days seems to be to make albums which are not separate songs, as one big continuous glob of music. We can pinpoint Public Enemy's last album as the source of this fad. Personally, we here at Junkie Central think this is an excellent direction for music to take. Big Audio Dynamite have done an exceptional job in this area with this new album. Random bits of half-done songs, careless chatter, whole verses from other people's songs thrown in, whatever effluvia they could dig up, it's all in there, and it really helps the album flow. But what about the actual songs? Well, we are pleased to report that they are amazing. We were always ridiculed for liking "Should I Stay or Should I Go?" better than the more "important" Clash songs, but it's tough to deny that Mick Jones has one hell of a knack for writing catchy tunes. Mention should also be made of Don Letts, the other chief brain behind BAD, and a guy with a great James Brown impersonation! Kudos also to Don Donovan's brillant keyboard work.

The great thing about Megatop Phoenix, is that it is not afraid to experiment. Big Audio Dynamite have pushed pop to the limits here, by incorporating pop styles, reggae, a little rap, house and acid house as well! For example "Rewind" is a perfectly catchy melody in its own right, but when BAD sticks a manic synth bass line behind it going through the typical acid house filter sweep, it rises into the realm of pure musical ecstasy. Slap Megatop Phoenix on the stereo at your next party. It's bound to raise a few smiles.

Until next week, and a hopefully exclusive preview of the new Kate Bush album, we here at Junkie Central are stepping out the page and into the Sensual World.

Case rides to the Horse on his post modern neo-tradionalist guitar

Regardless of how dull and dreary the seventies were musically, some good did come out of them. People who were fed up with getting nothing but the Bee Gees, Gloria Gaynor and Barry Manilow on their radios, fought back in the form of punk and new wave.

One of these bands was the Plimsouls, a west-coast, fuzzy guitar band that achieved minor success with their perennial hit "A Million Miles Away" from the Valley Girl soundtrack.

The leader of that band, Peter Case, is back. After his self-titled debut album met with critical acclaim, Case has returned with The Man With the Blue Postmodern Neo-Tradtionalist Guitar, which has already guaranteed him the Longest Album Title of the Year award.

Case, who will be appearing with a special guest at the Iron Horse this evening, has stripped down his sound considerably from his Plimsouls days.

On his two solo albums Case has taken the stark, acoustic approach. His songs are lyrical masterpieces sung above his raw, savage guitar. This is most evident on his lastest album, of which Case said, "most of the album was recorded first or second take; live vocal and guitar."

The album is also very personal. Songs such as "Entella Hotel" and "Poor Old Tom" deal with real people and places in Case's life, while the songs "Put Down that Gun" and "This Town's a Riot" deal with issues that are important to Case. Recently, Case has been opening shows for Neil Young and John Hiatt. His powerful and personal shows have been receiving the same accolades as his studio work.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

HAPPY BIRTHDAY! IN THE NEXT YEAR OF YOUR LIFE: A corporate 'head-hunter' will try to recruit you for a new position. Deciding whether to stay put or move on is difficult. Talk things over with your family. The financial outlook is excellent. Set aside more money for retirement. A change of lifestyle will give you a new glow. Romance takes on extra glamor in an unusual setting. Intellectual and reserved, you enjoy a very cozy private life. The right romantic partner will share your values. CELEBRITIES BORN ON THIS DATE: cowboy star Gene Autry, TV host Bryant Gumbel, actress Madeline Kahn, singer Jerry Lee Lewis, coach 'Bum' Phillips.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): The element of surprise is your key to success today. Keep new ideas under wraps. Financial pressure subside and so does tension. Enjoy a romantic evening on the town.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Be circumspect about repeating rumors. They could explode in your face. A real estate venture merits careful scrutiny. Use your leisure time to improve your relations with mate. Show tenderness.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Financial affairs are subject to profitable rearrangement today. Seek more information about an unclear situation. Romantic partner may have made a greater commitment than you realize.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): follow up on a recent application for a permit, visa or license. Family and friends are eager to share their ideas and plans. Temper an emotional response with logic to make important points.

LEO (July 23-Aug 22): Routine matters will be easier to handle if you get better ordered. A community project gives a retiree a strong feeling of satisfaction. Devote more time to a favorite hobby.

VIRGO (Aug 23-Sept 22): Your will to succeed inspires others. Stick to conventional methods in business. A new partnership adds zest to your life. You continue to thrive on change. Review your options.

LIBRA (Sept 23-Oct 22): Listen to other people's views before making a final decision. Your personal finances could be involved. Those in power look on your efforts with favor. Make a special effort to meet deadlines on time.

SCORPIO (Oct 23-Nov 21): If you feel cramped, look for more space. Or figure out ways to streamline things. A regular workout program helps you vent excess energy. Mate is more understanding than in the past.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov 22-Dec 21): Business and career affairs demand top priority. Put forth your best effort. Others are counting on you for favors; do not let them down. A brief message inspires romance. Stroll down memory lane.

CAPRICORN (Dec 22-Jan 19): Seek a quiet environment if you need to make tough decisions today. Consult higher-ups regarding changes. Talk over personal problems with family, not co-workers. A teen-ager makes a revelation.

AQUARIUS (Jan 20-Feb 18): Be careful not to judge others too harshly today. Keep in mind they may lack your experience or insight. You will be delighted with the way a newcomer follows your guidance. Offer praise.

PISCES (Feb 19-March 20): Keep your nose to the grindstone and you will complete routine tasks in record time. Do not let ambition cloud your judgement lest you make a tactical error. Review your game plan.

Celts buy radio station

BOSTON (AP) – The Boston Celtics already have a hold on the hearts of this city's basketball fans, and now the organization is looking for control over their eyes and ears as well.

Within the last two weeks, the Boston Celtics Limited Partnership announced plans to buy a local television station, WFXT, and an all-news radio station, WEEI.

A minority owned group, Diamond Communications Inc., also filed a letter of intent Thursday to buy the radio station, but Celtics spokesman Jeffrey Twiss said: "We intend to buy (WEEI) and they intend to sell it to us."

Radio station officials were not available for comment.

The Celtics have a contract with another television station to broadcast road games, but the agreement is set to expire next year; the radio station carries the Celtics games.

"It's a logical area for us to go into," Alan Cohen, a co-owner of the Celtics, said Thursday. "They are major sources of revenue for us."

This isn't the first time a sports franchise has joined forces with a communications company. Ted Turner, in Atlanta, has a sports and media empire that includes Turner Broadcasting System Inc., baseball's Atlanta Braves and basketball's Atlanta Hawks.

The Tribune Co. in Chicago owns the local WGN television and radio stations, plus the Chicago Cubs.

But observers say it is more unusual for a sports team to go out and purchase broadcasting interests.

"I think this is the first time it's happened," said Dennis McAlpine, a media industry analyst with Oppenheimer and Co. in New York.

Combining sports with broadcasting has obvious benefits, experts say.

"All of those games represent programming that we don't have to license out from the outside," said Marc Schacher, programming director for Tribune Broadcasting Co. "It's very cost effective."

Peter Appert, a media industry analyst with C.J. Lawrence Inc. in New York, said that with the Celtics, "you're going to assure yourself a pretty significant audience, which will bring in advertising revenue."

after completing 38 minutes of play. Junior Brett Shumsky settled in the goal to complete the game with a total of five saves. "I was happy to see Shumsky get in, play well, have to take some chances," said Gettler. "It's good to get a shutout."

On a penalty kick two minutes into the second half, sophomore Dan Lawrence made a direct shot, making the score 2-0. Thirty minutes later, Lawrence combined with senior Steve Cesnek to score the final goal of the game, ringing up the score 3-0. Freshmen Kenny Smith and Kire Trajkovski made their collegiate debut today.

It was a good team effort," said Gettler of his team's first win of the season against five losses and one tie."

This weekend UMass will host the Massachusetts Challenge Cup Tournament. Boston University will face up with the University of Delaware at noon on Saturday; UMass will see George Washington at 3 p.m. On Sunday BU will oppose GW at 11 a.m.; UMass will meet Delaware at 1 p.m. This is parents/alumni weekend for the team.

"This is a real important game for us," Gettler said referring to the GW game. "If we want to be a factor in the Atlantic 10 as a wildcard team, we'll need this game."

"UMass is a strong, physical team," Palmer said. "They have an explosive offense and Jerome Bledsoe gives them an added dimension to their attack."

The Minutemen have been hampered by injuries of late, losing starting guard Paul Mayberry and defensive tackle Steve Brothers for the season. Mayberry reinjured his knee and Brothers had been playing with a bad shoulder.

"We shouldn't have even played them," Reid said. "They wanted to play hurt, but sometimes you've got to tell them what's best. What's best now is to operate."

With John Creamer still a couple of weeks away with a knee injury, junior Rich Kane will get the start at defensive tackle, while Northampton's Pat Phillips gets the nod at guard.

"Pat Phillips is a fifth-year player, and is finally getting an opportunity to contribute to the team," Reid said. "We may get Creamer back in a couple of weeks. He was playing outstanding defensive tackle toward the end of preseason. He's finally doing some running."

Reid also moved freshman Bill Durkin from tight end to defensive tackle recently to make up for the lost depth.

Volleyball takes on national power Penn State

By DAN SARAZEN
Collegian Staff

This weekend the University of Massachusetts volleyball team will take on nationally-ranked Penn St. and St. Bonaventure University in what will be their first home games since their season opener against Hartford. The team is now 0-7 and despite these numbers the players and the coach have not lost their spirit.

"They come into practice to work," said head coach Carol Ford. "They have not lost any desire, they are still hanging in there."

Coming into the season, those most closely associated with the team acknowledged that this would be a rebuilding season, but few could have foreseen how difficult the season would be. True the team is winless and some of the losses have been lopsided, but the team has not lost pride in itself or their play.

That pride will be tested tonight when 15th-ranked Penn St. rolls into the parking lot over at Totman. The Nittany Lions will bring with them their 9-4 record and leading offensive threats JoAnn Elwell, a middle blocker, and outside hitter Eliz Ramirez. Penn State has never lost a game to UMass and this season has lost three of its four to ranked teams.

Saturday night at 7 p.m. the Minutewomen will see St. Bonaventure University. The Lady Bonnies have a 3-7 record and are in a rebuilding season of their own. The leading scorer for St. Bonaventure is freshman Janice Rossi. Rossi leads the team in hitting (.237), kills per game (3.44) and blocks with .264 a game.

The part of the UMass game that will be the deciding factor, as far a seeing improvement will be the blocking game. Leading the team in (also before Brown) blocking is Sharon Panoff with 5 solo blocks and 8 assisted blocks, followed by Santiago with 2 solo and 9 assisted and Rachel Bredmeier with 6 solo and 7 assisted. "The blocking has been very weak," said Ford. "We have not been doing a great job blocking."

Things being what they are, all anybody can ask of the team at this point of the season is that they do not give up on themselves and that they keep making the effort to improve.

Up front in the forward slots, Rudy is impressed by everyone he saw, in particular, three players. "Britton Arico is quite a gifted goal scorer," says Rudy. "Kristin Janosky has jets up front and she can flipping run. And a player we went after before, Denise Swenson, is quite fast and has got some skills."

The talent doesn't run out in the midfield with players like Angela Gibbons, Kim Prutting, and Beth Greco. Gibbons and Prutting were participants in the National Olympic Festival and Rudy feels that Prutting ("a big, statuesque girl" is Rudy's description) and Greco are keys to UConn's counterattack game. Greco had a very good game against UMass in last year's scoreless tie and Rudy says of her, "She's creative and holds the ball well."

About the Lady Huskies' back four, Rudy was not short on praise. "They've got a very old crew in the back and they did a hell of a job against Carolina," he said. Their best individual defender, according to Rudy, would be senior Mo O'Connor whom he labels "a very strong marking defender." Rudy has gotten a good look at their sweeper, Karen Abernethy, who is from his old stomping grounds in Orlando. Defending net for the Lady Huskies will be junior Amy Miller, who held opponents to less than half a goal per game last year.

When the Reds take to the field, it will mark the first time UMass has played at home since the opening Sept. 9-10 weekend. "Hopefully the Upper Boyden Hill confines will be beneficial for us," Rudy said.

Talking about the defensive quartet of Kim Montgomery, Sarah Szetela, Holly Hellmuth, and Margie Jaede taking on the UConn forwards, he said, "It's going be a hell of challenge for us. And about midfield clash (featuring April Kater and Prutting), Rudy went a step further and said, "Now that's gonna be a hell of challenge!"

Ding, ding – let the fight begin!

Rugby at home

The University of Massachusetts club rugby team will play Norwich University this Saturday (12:30 p.m.) at the lower Boyden Field.

The rugby team is 0-2 this season with losses to Holy Cross and St. Andrews University.

"We have a very young but talented team," captain Kevin Turner said."The skilled veterans that we do have are having to quickly learn new positions that were left vacant by graduating seniors."

Veteran forwards Rich Kendall, Mike Commerford, Keith Harrington, Guy Polizio and Bill McDonough are forwards that must take up some of the slack left by graduation.

In the backfield, Turner along with Tony Pirro and Robert Carney are expected to play big roles this season.

Football on the road to play BU

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

When is it dangerous to play a team that is 0-3?

When that team could just as easily be 3-0, with a little luck. That is the situation the Boston University football team has to face as it prepares to host the University of Massachusetts in a Yankee Conference battle tomorrow at 1:30 p.m. at Nickerson Field (WMUA 91.1, WTTT 1430, WHAI 1240, NESN on tape delay).

The Terriers haven't had the best of times this year. It started out with a 28-21 loss to preseason Yan Con favorite Delaware and then a tough 20-19 loss to West Chester in which co-captain Dennis Carson was suspended for the season for a run-in with an assistant coach after the game.

Last week was another toughie, a 28-27 loss at Dartmouth in a game in which BU dominated.

"They outplayed Dartmouth to the n-th degree," said UMass coach Jim Reid. "It's a shame there weren't judges in the stands to overturn that victory."

So the question is this: How will the Terriers respond to such adversity? It would be easy to roll over and play dead, and just as easy to suck it up and get motivated beyond belief. Reid knows that it doesn't matter what approach the opposition takes, he has to get his team ready to face any circumstances.

"We've got to take care of ourselves, play hard at the snap and play up to our potential," Reid said.

What that "potential" may be is hard to discern. The Minutemen looked good in its 28-28 opening tie against James Madison and then in a 42-23 win at Lehigh two weeks ago. But things slipped a little in last week's conference-opening loss at Maine.

Tomorrow the Minutemen are going to have to work at stopping the famed "Run and Shoot" offense of the Terriers, led by quarterback Stan Greene and receivers Daren Altieri and Darvell Huffman.

"They've been shooting more than running, but they run after they shoot," Reid said. "[BU coach] Chris Palmer is a guy who likes to throw the ball. He's a throwing coach."

The Terriers threw a lot in the last meeting here a year ago, bursting out to a 20-7 first-half lead before UMass rallied for a 44-27 victory.

"Last year our offense played poorly. We had a lot of turnovers that helped them out," Reid said.

As for this year's offense, Reid has been encouraged by what he's seen, but feels the best is yet to come.

"We've got to get the ball to Jerome [Bledsoe] more," he said. "We're still evolving. It's the fourth week of the season and we're still evolving on offense."

Last week at Maine, Reid had a tough time getting Bledsoe the ball with the tough Black Bear defensive rush. Thus the junior converted-tailback managed only 54 yards after racking up 209 the week prior at Lehigh.

But much like Patriot fans crying for Doug Flutie at quarterback, Reid says he has gotten some inquiries about Bledsoe from the general public.

"I got a note the other day from [Afro-American professor] Michael Thelwell that said, 'Run Jerome more,'" Reid said. "Maybe we'll give him a job on our coaching staff next year. But you don't have to be a department chair to know that."

So Bledsoe could have a field day on the Nickerson turf tomorrow. But UMass will also be looking for a rebound from quarterback Roger Baldacci, who threw his first three interceptions last week after a strong first two games at the helm.

UMass wins first

By ADRIENNE MATT

The University of Massachusetts men's soccer team wiped out the Huskies of Northeastern yesterday on Upper Boyden, 3-0. "I was real happy. Obviously, I made some changes," said head coach Jeff Gettler. "They showed communication early on. We used this game to let them sort out some of their adjustments."

The Huskies (0-5), however, (still) have yet to score a goal this season. UMass christened the game by scoring nine minutes into the game when Northeastern goalkeeper John Halasz took a goal kick, stricking it directly at freshman Ray Cunha, who controlled it and beat the keeper with the shot unassisted. Halasz had one save for the game.

Northeastern's offensive attempts endeavors were usually muddled by unnecesasary fouls (18) and wide shots on goal (15). UMass committed 14 fouls, while having 23 shots on goal. The Minutemen's offensive opportunities were increased by their number of corner kicks, 14, while Northeastern had 2.

The rivalry continues: UM vs. UConn

By RICK SETO
Collegian Staff

Picture this scene on Boyden Hill today at 3:30 p.m.:

"Introducing in the blue corner," the announcer says. "The Lady Huskies from the University of Connecticut. Currently ranked fourth nationally by the ISAA and first in the New England Region, coach Lenny Tsantiris and his team travels to Amherst with a 5-1-1 record."

The crowd, true to the Boyden standards set by the now-famous lax fans, boo and hiss after the introduction of the Boyden intruders and are tempted to throw Alpo dog bones on the field, but remember a certain Collegian columnist's plea about something with oranges and restrain themselves.

The fans then turn their attention to the referee with the anticipated introduction of the home team.

"And now introducing in the red corner," says the charged-up announcer. "Your University of Massachusetts Reds!" The crowd, numbering in the hundreds, goes wild.

"Currently ranked ninth nationally and second in the region, coach Jim Rudy and the Reds return to the Hill after a near three-week hiatus with a 5-2 record."

Though the fight scene might be a bit exaggerated, one thing is surely not — the importance of this game.

"This is the key game in the region at this point," says Rudy. "It could be for regional supremacy and at least in years past, it has been."

Rudy had a chance to see UConn perhaps at its best in a 1-0 loss to perennial national champion and current No. 1 North Carolina last week.

"Defensively they were quite good against NC," said Rudy in his evaluation. "I think they're an offensive team but they went into a defensive mode against NC. NC's chances were held to outside and UConn blocked most of their shots inside."

What impressed Rudy the most about the Lady Huskies was their team depth. "I was being critical and I rated them about 15 players deep," Rudy said. "And then they brought on two kids that did quite well also."

Minutewomen march into A-10 weekend

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

When a team beats another, for bragging rights purposes, it is always nice that the other team was at full strength. But when a key player to the opposition is out or hurt, it does not always make the victory as complete.

The University of Massachusetts field hockey team is about to go into a game with Penn State that it dearly would like to win, whether its goalie is injured or not.

"I know they're goalkeeper has been injured," UMass coach Pam Hixon said. "Their starting goalkeeper probably will not see action against us so if ever there is a time to go after Penn State it is this weekend."

Michele Brennan pulled a hamstring during warm-ups before a game last Sunday against the University of Connecticut. She had been cruising right through the season.

After UConn, the Nittany Lions were 5-1 and Brennan had given up just three goals, all in just one game against top-ranked and defending national champion Old Dominion University. In 298 minutes, Brennan had recorded 19 saves and an .864 save percentage.

So when UMass plays Penn State on Sunday (1 p.m.) after having played a weak St. Joseph's team on Saturday (1 p.m.), the Minutewomen will be able to breath a sigh of relief that Brennan is not standing between the goal posts. In fact, UMass may be catching a break in an important weekend double-header in which it will play two Atlantic 10 teams.

"Two wins this weekend would be outstanding for us," Hixon said. "A split is a must no matter how we slice it, we need at least one."

The Minutewomen are 1-0 in the A-10 after a 3-1 win over Rutgers Monday. Penn opens up its Atlantic 10 schedule today against St. Joe's. The Nittany Lions appear to be handicapped at the present moment, but the crutch they have to stand on has done the job in relief of Brennan.

Connie Ehresman stood in for Brennan against a tough Maryland team and virtually shut the Terrapins down as Penn State turned Maryland away, 2-1, in double overtime. It was an impressive effort and Hixon expects a dogfight this weekend.

"I think it's a 50-50 game," Hixon said. "Both teams are strong, both teams are very hungry to win."

According to NCAA polls, the Minutewomen are a little weaker. The Nittany Lions, 6-1, are ranked No. 5 and UMass, 5-2, No. 12 in the latest poll. Rankings will not be the only psychological warfare that the coaches may choose to employ in Sunday's confrontation.

The last time that these two teams hooked up, it was in the championship game of the Atlantic 10 tournament down at Temple University last November. UMass walked away with the title and its second win of the season over Penn State when Mara Fratassio scored a goal with just 15 seconds left in overtime. It's doubtful that Brennan, who gave up that goal, or the rest of the returnees from that squad, have programmed that loss out of their memory banks.

"Penn State wants to avenge that and I think they're stronger," Hixon said. "And that will be a real motivator for them but as defending champions, we have motivations of our own."

This year, the two teams are in reverse positions from last year. UMass played Penn State in that tourney game as the No. 4 team in the nation. Penn State was No. 10. There does not seem to be a clear cut team to beat in the A-10 this year like there was last fall when UMass ravaged through the regular season but the Nittany Lions may be considered the favorite at this point.

"Right now Penn State seems to have the biggest scores," Hixon said. "And Temple (the No. 8 team in the country) seems to do well on turf. It's hard to tell. I think it's going to be any day. It's going to be what surface you're playing on and who's healthy."

Fratassio is back and is healthy. She has scored four goals in the last two games. But Brennan is not healthy and may not be able to play.

Kenyan official visits UMass, discusses trade

Chancellor Joseph Duffey hosted a dinner party last night for Robert Ouko, the Kenyan Minister for Foreign Affairs and International Cooperation, and several Kenyan students studying at the University of Massachusetts.

Ouko, who was at UMass visiting his son, Kenneth, a student here, said this is his second time visiting UMass. Kenneth is a junior majoring in Civil Engineering who plans to return to Kenya after he completes his studies.

Duffey said there are also six Kenyan students on exchange from the University of Nairobi as part of a reciprocal exchange program with UMass. Duffey and his wife, Anne Wexel, have been in Kenya twice and visited Ouko both times.

Ouko said there are currently some 4,000 Kenyan students studying in the U.S., most of whom will return to Kenya.

He is in the United States for two weeks. After UMass, he is scheduled to meet with U.S. officials in Washington D.C. He has already met with President Bush and Secretary of State James Baker.

Their discussions focused on trade and tourist flow between the two countries and U.S. aid to Kenya, Ouko said.

"Kenya has a very close and cordial relationship with the U.S.," Ouko said.

He said the Kenyan economy has been growing steadily since Kenya attained independence from Great Britain 26 years ago.

Lobbyist donates cash to UM escort service

By NATHAN KRYSTALL
Collegian Staff

Anne Wexler, chairperson of a Washington-based lobbying firm, has given $1,000 to the floundering University of Massachusetts Escort Service.

The Escort Service provides escorts for students who feel uncomfortable walking home alone to their dormitories late at night.

Some $67,000 was cut from the UMass Public Safety budget this semester, severely hampering the Escort Service and the effectiveness of other safety programss, according to Dr. Arthur Hilson, director of Public Safety at UMass.

Wexler was given $1,000 as part of the annual Bryce Harlow Award for her contribution to the advancement of relations between government and business.

She made the donation after reading a story recently published in the Collegian detailing the program's plight. She hopes the money will help the program regain its level of service, she said.

"I think the program is important," said Wexler.

Hilson said $16,000 is still needed to bring the program back to last year's level, with three walking escorts and a car. This semester the service is using only one van.

"That's one [thousand] down and sixteen more to go," said Hilson. "I'm grateful to anyone who will help us maintain a much needed service."

Dennis Madson, vice-chancellor for student affairs, said the administration is looking for other sources of funding for the service.

Madson said the Student Activities Trust Fund, residential area governments and the Student Affairs Office are potential alternatives.

Wexler said she donated the money because she follows UMass campus affairs closely and she detected a need for funds in the Escort Service. She is married to UMass Chancellor Joseph Duffey.

"She's very involved with the community." Madson said.

Escort service cut angers student

By SARAH DEMASTER
Collegian Staff

Leyla Sarram, a freshman at the University of Massachusetts, is angry that the escort service has been cut.

"The escort service is excellent," she said. "It's so stupid that the escort service has been cut off, as opposed to other services on campus."

Sarram said she called the escort service at 10 p.m. on Sept. 9, and found she was number 10 on the waiting list.

Aware that students have waited up to an hour for an escort, she headed back to her dormitory alone.

In a letter to the Collegian, Sarram stated,"It is obvious that [members of the administration] have never had to walk in the dark with their hearts pounding in their chests and throats, and their muscles as hard as rocks with tension."

She said if the administration could see this side of the situation, they would have done more to oppose the cuts.

Sarram said she does not go out as often as she once did because of the lagging services.

"Whenever you go out somewhere, you have to plan how to get home," she said. "You can't always rely on having people to walk you back to your dormitory."

Sarram said the students are not the only people upset by the cutbacks.

"The dispatchers feel really bad," she said. "They keep apologizing, but I say, 'It's not your fault.'"

The drivers are also upset, she said. They are responsible for everyone on campus, and they are blamed for the wait.

"It's a great pity otherwise," she said.

Educators discuss racism and diversity in schools

By ANDREA I. ROLLINS
Collegian Correspondent

In an effort to combat racism and highlight the underlying problems surrounding diversity in our schools, the Pioneer Valley Educators for Social Responsibility (ESR) sponsored a workshop/discussion Thursday at the Amherst Junior High School.

The keynote speaker was Emma Gonzales, representing Metro New York Educators for Social Responsibility, who facilitate discussion on: Diversity, Conflict, and Racism: Educating for Mutual Respect and Understanding.

Seth Kreisberg, a teacher at the School of Education at the University of Massachusetts and also a member of the Pioneer Valley ESR Steering Committee, introduced Gonzales, who received her doctorate degree from the School of Education at UMass.

Gonzales urged the audience of some 40 educators, parents and concerned individuals to build children's self esteem and stress that diversity is essential to achieving world peace.

"Racism is a problem that attributes everyone in one form or another," she said. "It is dehumanzing to any of us in the world."

Gonzales is involved in the Model Peace Education Program in New York City's Community School District 15.

Preparing and presenting creative conflict resolutions and a vast range of programs, she feels she has an amount of rich experience working with these issues.

"Affirmation is the key beginning phrase to allow the children to take charge of themselves," she said. "Take power in ourselves and demonstrate what children themselves experience and have found out."

Gonzales said group support systems for adults as well as children build on the positive angle by encouraging the acceptance of each other's differences.

Through small groups and workable projects like these, she said, we can learn from our own mistakes.

"Always allow mistakes," she said. "Give ourselves freedom to make them and then go on to the next step."

It is essential to communicate and appreciate our differences without dwelling on the prejudices in the past or blaming ourselves for earlier mistakes, she said.

"Do not leave here tonight feeling blamed or feeling guilty," she said. "Assume what we have to work with is that we are not to be trapped by the past."

Since most children are comfortable with things they know, the support groups will encourage them to reach out in a smaller environment and break the isolation, she said.

After viewing segments of a children's special program produced by WCBS-TV, Names Can Really Hurt Us, Gonzales grouped the audience into a discussion area.

Group members were asked to offer such information as their personal ethnic backgrounds, prejudices they have ever witnessed and what they were doing to promote harmony.

Area residents of various ethnic backgrounds, including Germans, Italians, Jewish-Egyptians and others spoke of their families, languages, and contributions to society.

Through multicultural units in schools, storytelling, and acting as role models, the audience represented a wide range of positive attributes.

Groups were also asked to think about racism and to choose some important issues about racism in schools that need to be dealt with.

Staff training and awareness, acknowledgement of racism existing in schools, and celebrating differences in

The general assembly reviewed major international political and economic problems, Ouko said.

Namibian independence, the apartheid regime in South Africa and political turmoil in Lebanon, Kampuchea, Afghanistan and Central America were some of the political issues discussed, he said.

Ouko said the central economic issues on the agenda were falling world commodity prices, the Third World debt problem and the restructuring of the world international economic order.

"The debt problem is crippling Africa," Ouko said.

He said the industrialized nations have not reached a joint agreement on how to handle Third World debt but that they prefer to review debt problems on an individual basis.

"One of the root causes of Third World debt is the economic disequilibrium in the world," Ouko said. "It's time for an international conference on debt."

He said the meeting was attended by President Bush and other heads of state, including Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, the current chairman of the Organization of African Unity.

the community through a curriculum were among the suggestions.

All groups agreed that halting racism is a process that needs community building to succeed.

Gonzales urged the educators in the audience to bring these techniques into the classroom and encourage the younger generations to denounce racism.

"Actions will make an ultimate difference," she said. "As educators, initiating action and getting responses, you are part of the process."

She said to take the whole child into consideration and to remember that, "they are part of their own process," in learning about racism.

"It's important to know that racism needs to be worked on systematically," she said.

"People take on different stages and build enthusiasm to do more things continuously, for we are working on long term here, a better future."

Phon-a-thon defrays Newman Center expenses

Donations to benefit about one-third of operating budget

By BRYAN HOUSE
Collegian Correspondent

Student volunteers kicked off the fourth annual Phon-a-thon last night to raise money for the Newman Center.

Father Joseph Quigley, director of the Newman Center, said he hopes donations from the 15-night campaign will finance one third of the Center's yearly operating expenses.

Student volunteers will call more than 16,000 Catholic alumni and 5,000 Catholic parents all across the continental United States, Puerto Rico, Alaska and Hawaii. Phon-a-thon sessions will be Sunday through Thursday from 5:30 to 9:30 p.m., until Oct. 19.

"It [the Phon-a-thon] brings us in touch with the kids and benefits the University, demonstrating a spiritual life is alive on campus," Quigley said.

Volunteers raised more than $140,000 last year and Father Quigley set this year's at $165,000. He said the average donation is around $30.

> 'It (the Phon-a-thon) brings us in touch with the kids and benefits the University, demonstrating a spiritual life is alive on campus.'
> —Father Joseph Quigley

Between 300-400 students are needed to staff the 30 phone lines. Dinner and training will be provided to volunteers and prizes will be awarded as incentive.

The Greek Organization to raise the most will receive $250. A $50 award will be given to the person who raises the most money, with the most pledges and who works the most hours. The dorm or team to raise the most money gets $110.

Judy McKenna, a UMass alumna, is the development officer for the Phon-a-thon. She is responsible for training students and overseeing the program.

According to Quigley, the University and the Alumni Association have provided updated addresses and phone numbers of all students and former students who indicated they are Catholic and do not mind solicitation.

The Phon-a-thon was first held in April, 1986 to help meet the financial needs of the Center. The rest of the expenses are paid for with revenue from the rental of the cafeteria space. The Center is not financed by the state.

"It is the big thrust for us," said Quigley. "The Newman Center is open 365 days a year and makes no distinctions for race color or creed. Someone is always available for help with any problems: family, tutorial, or emotional. It even has a dating service," he said.

There are sign up sheets for all 15 days in the main hall of the Center.

Events increase awareness of disabilities

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts will kick off "Disabilites Awareness Week" today with a series of events in the Student Union and the Campus Center.

Events will begin at 10 a.m., with a Disabilities Resource Fair in the Student Union ballroom.

Paul Appleby, director of Handicapped Student Affairs, said the week is designed to discuss issues that affect disabled students and educate those who are not disabled.

"There's a lot that goes on in the life of a disabled person that [non-disabled people] have no understanding of," Appleby said. "This comes back to the name. It's to try to make the general public more aware."

The fair, which is scheduled to last until 4 p.m., features a Hearing Dog demonstration in the ballroom from 11 a.m. to noon.

Hearing dogs, like seeing eye dogs for the blind, are trained to repsond to knocks on doors, telephones, and things we can hear, Appleby said.

At 7:30 p.m., actress/singer Lisa Thorson, who is disabled, will facilitate an hour-long "Spokesong" in Campus Center room 1009.

Appleby said Thorson, who often performs in nightclubs, insists that all her performances be accessible to the disabled.

On Tuesday, folksinger Les Nichols will perform from 10 to 11 a.m. in Campus Center room 811B-15.

The perfomance will be followed by a presentation by the Communication Disorders department on "Augmentative Communication for Non-speaking, Severely Handicapped Persons." The presentation is scheduled to run from 1 to 3 p.m. in Campus Center room 811B-15.

An Alumni Career forum will be held Wednesday at 8 p.m. in Campus Center room 804.

"We feel that could be helpful to some of our disabled students," he said. "I think it's going to be a good panel."

On Thursday, a workshop on "Legal Rights of the Disabled" will be held fom 1 to 3 p.m. in Campus Center room 811B-15.

The workshop will be headed by Matthew Engel of the Disability Law Center.

Missing papers delay Commuter election again

By KATHERINE T. LAMOTHE
Collegian Staff

The Commuter Area Government elections, scheduled for Thursday, may be postponed again because a stack of nomination papers were discovered missing Friday morning, according to CAG Governing Board member Brian-James Crawford.

Crawford said nomination papers of at least 36 candidates for the CAG governing board were discovered missing before the Friday afternoon deadline for turning in the papers.

All completed papers were scheduled to be delivered to the Governmental Affairs committee's mailbox, he said.

Four of the missing nomination papers were found in the Student Government Association Governmental Affairs committee's mailbox, Crawford said. He said he does not know how the papers got there because they were originally placed in the Commuter office.

The other papers have not been recovered, Crawford said.

The papers of the "Progressive Coalition," 32 candidates, are still missing, he said. None of the progressive candidates had been able to gather enough signatures to qualify for candidacy, said Ted Chambers, a member of the coalition.

Robb Smith, also a member of the coalition, said he had first heard of the missing papers Thursday night. He said he left the papers with Chambers to get more signatures.

Crawford, also a candidate for the Governing Board, said his papers were not among those which disappeared. He said his had already been turned in to the Student Government Association office before the others vanished.

Because all of the Commuters' officers and board members are running in the races the SGA is handling the election, Crawford said.

This change, coupled with some confusion over where the forms were to be dropped off, may have contributed to the missing papers, he said.

Crawford said he did not believe there was any conspiracy against the candidates.

"I don't think there was any harassment," he said. "I just think they were lost."

But Smith said the missing papers and the Undergraduate Student Senate's failure to ratify the commuter area's senate elections may not be a coincidence.

"There is a mindset that is alive and well in the SGA that would like us to not be a part of it," he said.

Smith also said he is becoming increasingly frustrated by the delayed elections. He said this frustration may hurt the coalition.

"I've been getting a bit upset and a bit angry," he said. "Those emotions are not constructive. The coalition is meant to be constructive, not destructive."

Chambers said the delay, although unfortunate, is necessary for the candidates to finish gathering signatures.

Crawford and Smith agreed, however, that the delay may encourage new commuter area students to become involved with the government.

Nomination papers will be accepted in the Commuter Area Government in the Student Union building until Friday.

At least the communication lines will remain open

Orange has always been a color that I associated with autumn. But lately orange does not make me think of leaves gently falling from trees, blowing in the wind, or pumpkins and other fall vegetables.

Actually, I think of the flourescent orange fencing the University contractors have placed all over the Central/Orchard Hill area.

The University has decided to install a new, improved telecommunications network. That is, new phone lines and cable TV. So, to put these underground wires in, the workmen have to dig up the the old cables, which run between every building, break the old protective ducts and put in new ones. Then they will run the new cables until they are all spliced and ready for use.

I understand that the contractors have to do this work while the weather is good and before the ground gets too hard. But now I peer down at the Orchard Hill bowl, which looks like a small verison of trench warfare in World War I.

Walking through Central Residential Area also reminds me of descriptions of a demilitarized zone. The trenches dug to surface the cables are like a giant mole has tunneled all over the campus.

Gayle Long

Another great thing is all of the great vehicles the workmen get. My favorite is the cement truck.

Two days ago, I sat a safe distance from the construction site and watched the rainbow-striped mixer try to back up between two trees. The driver was assisted by one of his buddies, and I am not sure who does not know their left from their right, but one of the poor trees was almost a victim of environmental abuse.

Last year when I was new to the campus, I was astonished by the beauty of a rural New England fall. My family came to visit, and they enjoyed the modern buildings offset by trees, grass, and a general country atmosphere.

I have returned to find the campus resembling a neon battlefield, complete with bulldozers, blockades, and hardhats.

I am not a nature freak by any means. I love my telephone, my electronic typewriter, and my MTV. But for me to walk to class down a tree-lined footpath or sit out near the campus pond is something that I enjoy. But walking to the dining commons and having to walk amidst a construction crew, their dump trucks and tractors is something I am not particularly fond of.

So, new students, do not despair as you take your family on a tour of campus on Parent's Weekend, and they look at the construction and wonder what it is all about.

Just tell them that although you only got three classes because of the budget cuts, next year you will be able to watch cable TV instead.

After all, if you cannot get the classes that you want, at least you have something to occupy your time.

It is not as if they probably could have kept a couple of course sections open, instead of keeping the communication lines open.

The struggle has just begun

On Sept. 28, David R. Mark held a press conference to "clarify" his "so-called racist remarks."

The outcome of this meeting was a blunt rejection of the three demands of the students who sat-in at the Collegian. Confronted with the cumulative evidence of two years of racist slander against Palestine, Arab and Muslim people (the worst being the personal work of Mark), Mark resorted to the "liberal" double-talk so popular with institutional racism.

On being confronted with an article written May 11, 1988 where he states, "I have my own views on the Palestinian People," Mark stated, "I was only 19 when I wrote that."

In spite of proof of repeated slander, Mark refused to resign, rambled on about First Amendment rights (we are not curbing freedom of speech, only questioning his responsibility as editor in chief) and cleverly dodged a demand for a Third World page.

This university is home to over 1,000 students fro China, South Asia, Africa, Latin America etc. We do not wish to restrict space on a Black Affairs page, and reject the logic of a Multicultural page.

On Friday all the demands were rejected by the predominantly white Collegian Staff. To further exacerbate matters, Peter Leon wrote his "Notes from the Basement" where he states Mark's remarks are "open to interpretation." Who's interpretation? What does he understand about the anger of a Palestinian who reads those remarks? Leon made an offensive remark when saying "The return of the Black Affairs is a much more sensitive issue." How dare he try to categorize and differentiate anti-Palestinian and anti-Black racism? Is racism against Third World Nationals acceptable because we have not been vocal?

The Collegian has confirmed our deepest fears. The lines have been drawn. The struggle has only begun.

Editor's note: The Collegian is dismayed with the attempt in the above letter to portray editors as bluntly rejecting protesters' demands. In fact, several protesters were told of our Board of Editors meeting yesterday, at which time the demands were discussed. No vote was taken because no protesters came to the meeting to present their demands formally. The subject will be brought up again at the Oct. 15 meeting.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted

We must work together to achieve diversity

The Multicultural Affairs desk, established in September, 1989, is one of eight departments at the Massachusetts Daily Collegian.

The desk is designed to encompass all minority groups on campus, including but not limited to: African American, Asian and Asian American, Cape Verdean, Hispanic, Native American and Third World students.

The inception of the Multicultural Affairs desk is an expansion of the Black Affairs desk. In consulting reports on minority students at the University of Massachusetts Admissions Office, it is clear that the Collegian is not covering all minority communities fairly, especially the large Asian and Hispanic populations on campus.

The Collegian is attempting to broaden its scope to prevent the neglect of certain areas on campus. It is essential that the minority community leaders work with the Collegian and its editors toward that goal.

To clarify several misconceptions:

The Multicultural editor, Scott C. Hill, is being paid and receives a vote on the Collegian board of editors. As editor, Hill will serve as a liaison to all minority groups. He has also been allotted funds to hire two associate editors.

Associate editors are hired according to ability and are not restricted to covering specific areas because of race — unless this is the individual associate's preference.

It is essential that all minority groups be represented, regardless of whether members of these groups are writing for the Collegian.

The desk is expected to produce a page every other Tuesday that features a variety of multicultural events on and off campus. As other desks, Multicultural Affairs plans to contribute to the daily news so stories on minorities appear throughout the paper.

An early morning reflection

It must be the most sickening sound in the world. Softly, but steadily, it comes through the wall on my right. Beep. Beep. Beep.

An alarm clock in the girls' room next door is going off. Either they're not there, or it isn't loud enough to wake them up. How they could not have woken up, I don't know. A foot thick concrete wall hasn't stopped the damn alarm from waking me up.

Bob Bobala

It's 7:30 a.m., but that's okay. I don't have to get up yet. I'll fall back to sleep, eventually.

Beep. Beep. Beep. It reminds me of when I was in high school. My alarm would go off at 5:45 a.m. - the same gross sound. I'd feel nauseous, as if I were going to throw up. But I'd get up out of necessity. I'd drag myself to the shower, but before turning the water on I'd fall asleep on the bathroom floor. I don't know how I made it through 12 years of school.

Society is warped. To make a kid get out of bed at 6:00 a.m. in the morning so he or she can study multiplication tables and vocabulary words at 8:00 is insane. No wonder half the kids in early grammar school cried on the first day of school. "Nine months of Beep. Beep. Beep. Five days a week for nine months straight. I can't go on! Sob. Sniffle."

Not that it's any better once you're out of school and into the work world. To get to work on time this summer I had to get up at 7:30 - which is nothing compared to 5:30. There were times, however, when I went in an hour earlier. With only a 10 minute commute I still didn't have it so bad. The depressing thing for me was that at 7:30 there were twice as many cars on the highway as there were at 8:30. Poor, lost souls midway through an hour or more commute.

Then of course there are the long-range ramifications of "alarming" ourselves too early in the morning. Any shrill beeping sound instantly shocks me back into my 5:45 am mode. Yes, no matter what time of day I may hear it, I become queasy and the urge to upchuck returns. Beep. Beep. Beep.

Deep at the core of civilization, there is something so fundamentally wrong that it will take a mid-morning sleepers' revolution of catastrophic proportions to bring about the change this society needs. Our very way of life deprives us of sleep. Either that or the early birds in power have been discriminating against those of us who are more comfortable sleeping from 2:00 a.m. to 10:00 a.m., or there abouts. We must revolt!

Beep. Beep. Beep.

It's not that I want to sleep for 10 hours a day or even that I wouldn't like to get up early every day. I love the quietness of dawn, the beauty of the sunrise. But even if I get out of bed at 8:00, I'm not awake until sometime after noon. It's just the way I am. I do my best work and have my best concentration (if I have any at all) in the dark, late at night.

It's almost eight o'clock now. Beep. Beep. Beep. The girls next door still haven't shut that alarm off. It's okay though, I've got time to fall back to sleep. My earliest class this semester is at 11:15.

Maybe I'll just lie here for a while and think about what kind of third shift job I can get in May when I leave this fantasy land of late nights, late mornings, and college. Beep. Beep. Beep.

Time to guard our garbage

Looks like your trash can get you into a lot of trouble nowadays.

Private eye Terrance Downs said this week in Newsweek that he has "solved so many cases with garbage. We go by at night, take the garbage and replace it with similar bags. Then we put on the plastic gloves and go through it."

Alise Harfield

Crafty. Sounds like a meticulous if not "offal" task.

Nothing like getting your hands dirty (no pun intended) in your work, as I was always taught.

I hope you realize the weight of all this.

This guy, and a lot of his cohorts who were undoubtedly too embarrassed to admit that they tear through other's discarded personals for a living, are revealing to inquirers that their spouses and friends are adulterers, alcoholics, AIDS victims, etc. — with findings based on a heap of trash.

For example, a woman suspected her husband of an affair. She hired a professional investigator to follow him, watch him and go through his Hefties. (Hint –1: She might have saved considerable dollars and time by searching his stuff before he threw it out, you know, when it was clean . . .)

The finding? He was cheating on her, according to discarded phone bills, notes and matchbooks from various places he frequented.

This is real. Any and all of our refuse could be game for random searches such as this. Perhaps someone is searching through the plastic at the end of your driveway right now . . .

And we have no alternatives — it's not as if we can start collecting waste in our corners.

So, for our protection I have compiled — with limited help from the Home Offices in Oklahoma City, Ok. — the first Top Ten Ways to Allude an FBI Investigator When He is Going Through Your Trash:

10. Whenever possible, eat your roommate's food. This way, (they'll think whatever she eats is really what you eat), while in fact you'll never be blamed for excess, toxic pasta consumption.

9. Keep all album jackets. It's no one's business that you have an Ozzy Ozbourne affixation.

8. Remove hair from and dismember all razor blades (to avoid possible weaponry accusations)

7. Stop using blood-facsimile agents: ketchup, tomato sauces, chili powder, various peppers (or anything else really red.)

6. When your roommate finds out you've been eating her food, apologize, send her a smalls stipend, then do it again. She'll never know.

5. Move to an apartment complex with several brown dumpsters, and for goodness sake, stop buying those personalized Glad bags.

4. Keep all ancestral clothing in the garage. They could be mistaken for disguises. (Remember Norman Bates??)

3. Mix any extra marijuana with old grass clippings. Or, give away what you already have to unsuspecting friends.

2. Buy dog, cat and fish food for oversized pets. Throw 'em off track!

(Drumroll, please)

. . . And now, the number One Way to Allude an FBI Investigator When He is Going Through Your Trash:

1. Pretend you're a conglomeration and dump it all in the ocean!

(Take it away Paul.)

Good luck, everyone!

The dependency on military research in budget crisis

On Friday I discussed the background of the budget crisis in higher education. Now I turn to UMass.

Massachusetts higher education had been particularly hard hit in recent years due to the drastic falloff in state tax revenues. Business groups in the state — particularly the High Tech Council — and business financed lobbies, such as the Citizens for Limited Taxation, have used the crisis to advance their political agenda. High flown rhetoric aside, what the High Tech Council really wants from the University is two things: top level research to result in product development and profits for the major companies, and a trained personnel able to staff the lower-middle echelons of the high tech firms in sufficiently great supply to keep salaries in line.

Samuel Bowles

They are not concerned if you've never encountered John Milton, Saint Thomas Aquinas, Sigmund Freud, or even Isaac Newton. They do not mind if you have to pay more for your training, especially if it means lower taxes for them.

Everywoman's Center, founded "to promote access and equity for women in higher education" has already lost two of its ten staff positions and half of its operating budget resulting in the closing of two essential programs: the Working Women's Program and the Women's Advocacy and General Educational Support Program.

The Labor Relations and Research Center, which has for years offered students the opportunity to learn about American labor, and offer their learning to labor unions: cut 28 percent. University Without Walls, which offers higher education to working adults around the state: cut 48 percent. Basic Math Program, which helps students overcome their difficulties in math: cut 100 percent. Three more general trends at the University:

Students are paying more and getting less: tuition and fees are rising and state appropriations to the University are falling. According to the Bursar's Office, student tuition and fees have risen by 15 percent between academic year 87-88 and 89-90 (correction for inflation). Over the same period, state appropriations to UMass have fallen by 15 percent (also taking account of inflation).

The University is increasingly becoming a school for the rich. In 1985, 5.9 percent of our incoming class reported that their families had incomes between $75,000 and $100,000; by 1988 the figure had risen to 11.4 percent. In that year over half of the incoming first year students were from families making over $50,000. Some of this increase is due to inflation; most is explained by the growing under-representation of students from less well off families.

The University is becoming dependent on military research. In 1981 4 percent of research funds at the University were from the Department of Defense, in 1989 21 percent are from the military. Over this period the sum of research money under military research grants grew over five times as rapidly as non-military; one-third of the increase in research money on campus came from the D.O.D. In 1981 military research contracts was equal to 1.1 percent of the Massachusetts state appropriation to UMass; in 1989 it is equal to 7.7 percent of state appropriation.

Less obvious is the economic folly implied by pressures to convert the undergraduate curriculum to a training ground for the high tech firms. The University is ideally suited to teach science, mathematics, humanities and social sciences, but it is not the most effective place to learn vocational skills. The reason is that basic intellectual skills and values are a lifetime treasure, while vocational skills must be constantly retooled, in part because we change jobs frequently.

I am writing to ask you to think it over, and to speak out for what you think is right for you and for the university community. If you do, you will have plenty of company. I hope to hear you.

Led Zeppelin returns, sort of recalls memories of yesterday

Physical Graffiti plays two shows

By JORDAN POLLINGER
Collegian Correspondent

Physical Graffiti
Katina's
Thursday, Sept. 28

The Led Zeppelin legacy ended a long, long time ago —John Bonham is dead, Robert Plant is a joke, Jimmy Page is struggling for survival and no one really knows where John Paul Jones is.

But last Thursday night, a band called Physical Graffiti arrived in the Valley and became the mighty Zeppelin for two hours at Katina's. Physical Graffiti, who took their name from Zep's sixth album, delivers great Zep music in a package that fully resembles the band that died in 1980.

The Live Aid concert, with the addition of Bonham's son was lame. Watching the drugged and physically pathetic Page stagger aroung the stage was depressing. Then there was Plant's "Non-Stop Go" thing. As the founding members of Zeppelin have failed in their attempts at a revival of the band, Physical Graffiti proves to be an exciting imitation.

They look, act, and sound like Zeppelin. Doug Putnam becomes Page, sporting the bell-bottoms, the unbuttoned silk shirt, the hair and the Gibson. He even broke out a bow during "How Many More Times."

Matt Heatherm imitates Plant's style with those crazy hand motions and a fantastic voice, which he threw out to the crowd during "Whole Lotta Love." Matt McIlhoney assumes Jones' low-key approach to the live performance, and exceled on keyboards during "Your Time is Gonna Come." And as Bonham, Barry Fox uses the tree trunk drum sticks to pound out the classic "Moby Dick."

It took them a while to break in the crowd of about 150, and it was not easy to let go of preconceptions that this band would not be able to put on a great show. They got off on the wrong foot, as "The Song Remains the Same" was not a terribly good opener.

Physical Graffiti got cranking with "Custard Pie" and "Misty Mountain Hop," and after twenty minutes or so, the audience was loose. The band hit songs from every Zeppelin album except In Through the Out Door.

The show was divided into two hour-long sets, and mixed perfectly. Especially great were "Since I've Been Loving You," "Babe, I'm Gonna Leave You," and "Over the Hills and Far Away."

'Kashmir" and "Immigrant Song" kicked, as did "We're Gonna Groove," off of Coda. To close out the second set, the band played a medley of "Heartbreaker," "Whole Lotta Love," and "The Crunge," which rocked the house .

Physical Graffiti returned after their long break to play a great cover of "Rock and Roll," ending the night on a note that even the original Zep would be proud of.

Violinist and pianist in free recital tomorrow

Tomorrow night at 8:00 p.m. pianist Nadine Shank will be accompanied by violinist Charles Treger for a performance in Bezanson Recital Hall in the Fine Arts Center. The concert is free to the public.

The concert will include a performance of Beethoven's Sonata in A Major, Op 30, one of the masters' ten Violin Sonatas that is rarely played. Perhaps this is due to it's musical, technical difficulty, but it is undeniable that the piece is one of Beethoven's greatest gifts to the violin and to all string instruments.

Stravinsky's Suite Italienne will also be performed. The piece is transcribed from the orchestral suite "Pulcinella" and should be one of many highlights of this show. Also featured will be Sonata in A Major by Faure, a piece that should allow both Treger and Shank to fly to the moon and back in a rocket of violin and piano virtuosity. We speak here of some of the most incredibly affecting musical harmony and blending under the stars.

"One of our most important violinists," is the description the New York Times has for Charles Treger, a professor right here at UMass. Nadine Shank is the principal orchestral pianist with the Springfield Symphony Orchestra.

Cynical folkie Peter Case entertaining but unoriginal

By JAY BRIDA

Peter Case

Friday, Sept. 29

Peter Case struts on stage, looking like a road-beaten warrior who is ready to reveal great truths of the cosmos. I think it was his pony tail that made him look like the sage, or maybe it was the all-knowing cigarette that dangled from his guitar, its smoke spiraling skyward.

"He looks the part," you say, knowing the folkie stereotype, "But is it art?" Well, it was pretty damn close, some people went as far to say that they were witnessing the Second Coming (of Dylan, silly).

For his part, Case is a solid, intense singer/songwriter/guitarist, telling us his tales of despair and gritty resolve. He wants us to know that he's "been there," and that with time all innocence is lost. Fine. We all know that, take us there, man. Bring us home.

REVIEW

Case kicked off his set with "Walk in the Woods," a stark, simple exercise from his first album revealing alienation and lonliness. Hey, for Southern California country-folk, (Case is friends with Californians Ry Cooder and T-Bone Burnett), it beat the hell out of the Eagles.

He is into narration, he spun his yarns among the coffeehouse crowd at the Iron Horse; a man in his element.

Still, there's a bit more cynicism in his voice than say, Tracy Chapman or Suzanne Vega. "Power, Lust and Money" portrayed some of his more bitter feelings toward the record industry. With this caustic attitude he revealed that he was, "The Bad Boy of Christian Folk Music." They grow 'em weird in L.A.

Case was acoustically marvelous, laying down his licks and breaking his strings (he probably shattered the Iron Horse record for most broken strings.). He sounded nothing like the Peter Case of the Plimsouls. Unfortunately, he sounded too much like Nebraska-era Springsteen. "The Garden of Earthly Delights" was his most obvious ode to the Boss.

Case was at his best when he was joined by his low-key, two-piece backing band. They churned through rockabilly tunes like "Satellite Beach" and "This Town's a Riot" (his view of L.A. hell.). They also played a strikingly pretty, country-tinged "Two Angels." It would have made Hank Williams proud.

All in all, Peter Case played a good, strong, solid set, but if you were looking for pure originality, look elsewhere. However, if you were looking for the future of old-fashioned folk music, you could do worse than Peter Case.

Bill Morrisey was a surprise opening act for the show. He is, after all, a friend of Susanne Vega. His latest single, "Handsome Molly," features Vega on background vocals, but sounded just as beautiful without her assistance. Morrisey will be headlining his own show at the Iron Horse on Friday, and if you are a fan of homespun songs about alcoholic despair with humorous interludes sandwiched in between them, be there.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

HAPPY BIRTHDAY! IN THE NEXT YEAR OF YOUR LIFE: A policy of understatement will serve you well in your career and business dealings now. A longtime wish will come true during the holidays. Key people may not always be cooperative, but when the chips are down, they rise to the occasion. A second job could be the answer to a temporary cash shortage in February. Your intuition helps you find the best solution to a family dilemma next summer. The harmony you enjoy with close associates is a big business asset.

CELEBRITIES BORN ON THIS DATE: designer Donna Karan, songwriter Don McLean, rock star Sting, India's Mahatma Gandhi, comedians Groucho Marx and Bud Abbott.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Do not allow yourself to be undermined by the past. Financial negotiations can be successfully finalized. Take higher-ups' orders in stride; you will be royally rewarded.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Make last-minute changes in your business plans with complete confidence. Keep in close contact with overseas clients. Unwind a little so that others get to know the real you.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): A change of heart could alter your mood by noon. You are entering a busy social or romantic cycle. Do not waver in your loyalty. Avoid anything that smacks of intrigue.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): The emphasis now is on home and property interests. Do not force a showdown with a temperamental partner. Keep a close eye on any children in your care. Ask for more cooperation.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Curb a tendency to put too many irons in the fire. Otherwise you could run into opposition from close associates. Charm and gentle persuasion will win your mate and others to your side.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): An important business project finds financial support. Make certain your partner is behind you. Those to whom you are legally bound could cause problems if not consulted.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22):Be ready for a frustrating experience and monetary losses if you gamble. Your career hopes could be realized through an old school friend. Acts of kindness will be richly rewarded. Do favors.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Depend on your hard work to bring new rewards. Certain emotional ties need to be re-evaluated. Pay more attention to the questions that affect your physical well-being and employment status.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Cooperation and pooled resources are the key to increased productivity and worthwhile achievements. Incessant striving will bring rich rewards. Listen to suggestions of trusted friends.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Look forward to a day of action. You gain one of your heart's desires and advance your creative interests. Hold back if you risk marital discord. Singles should plan now for future travel.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Any lessons you learn now will have great value. Be cautious and thrifty. Things go smoothly at work when everyone pitches in. Romance continues to occupy your thoughts. Privacy is essential.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Things seem quiet on the surface. Look for signs of confusion on unexpected developments. Watch over your possessions and resources. Be on your guard if you must engage in secret adventures.

ECAC to honor UMass swimmer tonight

Leary overcomes heart attack to set seven school records

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

When speaking of amazing comebacks from adversity, a few names come to mind.

There is Jeff Blatnick, former Springfield College wrestler who fought off Hodgkin's Disease to win the 1984 Olympic gold medal in Greco-Roman wrestling. More recently, it was San Francisco Giants pitcher Dave Dravecky, who had a cancerous tumor removed from his pitching arm, and returned to pitch in two games before fracturing his arm.

Closer to home there is a story which, simply put, is amazing. Senior Michele Leary, a member of the UMass swimming team suffered a mild heart attack last October, something that would force most athletes to a premature retirement.

But eight weeks later, Leary was back in the pool, swimming better than ever. Seven UMass records set after the heart attack only make the story that much more incredible.

Today, the Eastern College Athletic Conference will present Leary and Albright (Penn.) College senior Brian Brick, a soccer player who battled back from a heart transplant, with the ECAC Award of Valor at the Tara Hyannis Hotel.

Established in 1985, the award recognizes the athlete "whose courage, motivation and relentless determination serve as an inspiration to all. The recipient of the ECAC Award of Valor exemplifies strength of character, perseverance and most importantly, whose accomplishments deserve recognition as being truly triumphant."

In fact, Leary says the hardest part of the comeback will be making a speech today in front of 300 people.

"I didn't even know I was nominated," Leary said. "It's really nice. I thought it was just another award."

It is not just another award, just as Michele Leary is no ordinary success story.

On Halloween last year, Leary began to feel dizzy, with tingling and pain in her arms, the classic symptoms of a heart attack. "It was so blatant that I was having a heart attack," Leary said.

What it turned out to be was a coronary spasm, still plenty of reason for concern.

"I was sitting in my office when I got a call saying that I'd better get up to Health Services, because Michele was there," said UMass women's swimming coach Bob Newcomb. "When I got there she was strapped down on a table wearing an oxygen mask with an IV running. I said, 'this is not good,' and she said, 'Bob, I'm going to be a little late for practice today.'"

Most people in that situation would be fearing for their lives, but Leary was determined to recover. Not only did she recover, she may have done it faster than anyone, ever.

"It takes eight weeks for a heart muscle to heal," Leary explained. "They said after Jan. 2 I could cut loose. Jan. 3 I was in the water and Jan. 6 I swam my first meet."

Which doesn't mean that the whole ordeal didn't faze Leary. Quite the contrary. After all, it's not every day that a well-conditioned 21-year-old suffers a heart attack.

"If I was doing something I shouldn't have been, that's different," Leary said. "But I was eating right and exercising. The cardiologist came in after two days and asked me if I ever smoked, or did coke, and I said, 'no, no, no.' He said, 'you've been hit by lightning.'"

Such a rare occurrence for this to happen to someone so young. Even rarer for someone to do what Leary has done since it happened. Consider the seven records she set, including individual marks in the 50, 100 and 200 freestyle, all New England records.

"Those times are all New England records that hadn't been beaten in seven or eight years," Leary said. "There's no logical reason why it happened."

Not only was Leary coming back from a heart ailment, but she was also swimming on a half-season's work.

"If I could explain it, I'd be a best-selling author," Newcomb said. "How to Win the New Englands in Six Weeks or Less."

"Things started to progress with my rehab. I insisted on doing all my rehab in the water," Leary said. "I was swimming for two weeks, at 20 minutes a day."

"Her heart rate could go no higher than 120, which for her is barely moving," Newcomb said. "We didn't treat her any differently. Once the eight weeks were over, we had to build her back up and taper her different than usual, but we didn't cut her out of workouts."

New England swimming coaches were shocked at the speed of Leary's recovery, and then shocked even more to discover what Leary was doing once she got in the pool.

"So many coaches asked me, 'how can you let her swim?'" Newcomb said. "It's not my decision. The doctors say she can do anything she wants to. This coming back was her decision, and the d?ere totally confident in what she's doing."

"When people tell you you can't do something, it makes you want to do it even more," Leary said. "I'm not afraid to win."

Through the whole battle, Leary kept everything about swimming and life in perspective.

"It's scary, I could have just as well died. If someone said, 'Michele, you've either got to get off the drugs, or stop swimming,' there would have been no choice."

The doctors felt that Leary could make the comeback and gave her the go-ahead, something that she welcomed.

"One of the things the doctor said is that there is such a thing as a cardiac cripple. You basically roll over and play dead," Leary said. "Getting back in was my way of getting over it. It was a really good mental exercise.

"I may not be the most successful, but maybe the quickest recovery. Nobody pushed it as fast as I did," she said. "But if I didn't have a heart attack, I wouldn't have been disappointed with my season."

women's soccer

From the beginning, it was quite obvious that the Lady Crusaders were no match for UMass. The Reds were able to control and move the ball around in the Holy Cross end with relative ease.

UMass coach Jim Rudy was happy to see his team progress offensively, especially after slightly altering his offensive system. "It was nice to score six goals for the first time in two years," said Rudy. "We started five defenders and on a team you figure you want to attack with, that's a dichotomy," Rudy explained.

Kater promptly started the Reds off on the right foot as she ran down a loose ball on the goal line, reversed back to give herself enough shooting angle, and popped one into the net past goalie Sarah Porell.

On a day where everybody fared well, Kater spread some of her scoring wealth to fellow midfielder Colette Bowler, who scored her first career goal. Kater fed the ball to Bowler on the right side and lobbed the ball as if to cross, but the ball was hit well enough to find net and a 2-0 lead.

Kater finished her scoring right before and after the halftime intermission. With less than two minutes to the break, Kater deftly chipped one in southpaw and ten minutes later, she scored on what else but a header.

The fifth goal was an appropriate one for the Cross, as they scored a goal on themselves. A defender tried to knock the ball back to the goalie on a routine play, but it got away from second-string goalie Peg Sullivan. As if UMass really needed help scoring on the overwhelmed Lady Crusaders.

The final goal was a sweet and pretty one, as three Reds touched the ball before it crossed the goal line. Margie Jaede, normally a defender, ran the ball down the left side and gained control of the ball. She centered to freshman Kim Eynard, who found Becky Bonzano open to the right of her. It was quite a rewarding score, after Bonzano returned to the team after some time off.

Bonzano was part of the five-man defense that ate the Purple up, protecting keeper Skye Eddy, who faced only one shot on goal. Bonzano, with her good feet and speed, played up near the midfield and had Jaede, Holly Hellmuth, and Sarah Szetela playing directly behind her. Kim Montgomery once again did a fine job sweeping.

The UConn game Friday was perhaps the best the Reds played this year. In this key New England encounter, UMass tied the higher-ranked Huskies, proving that they could match up with one of the toughest teams in the nation.

The skill advantage that UMass possessed started to pay some dividends, as the Reds shifted some of the pressure onto a tough and experienced UConn defense. Sue Gaudette blew the first good UMass chance at taking the lead, as her lefty flick in front of the net sailed about three inches over the crossbar.

Halfway through the second half, Eynard strutted some of the goods that makes her valuable commodity to UMass. Her blazing speed enabled her to run a ball down in the UConn box with keeper Amy Miller out of position, but also could not break the tie.

For the chances that UMass failed to finish, UConn took one and struck the fear of losing into the hearts of the Reds. Substitute forward Julie Naumec slipped past three defenders and placed a ball that was just out of the range of Mary Curtis.

With 19 minutes left in the game, Rudy pulled a defender and inserted an extra forward — Michele Woodside. The gamble paid off for Rudy as Woodside scored on a most pretty goal.

Oh, and about that scoreboard. It was working and had been since the beginning of the fourth game. Hmmm.

The fifth and final game proved to be equal to the fourth. UMass shot out to a 7-2 lead, thanks in part to a kill by Julieta Santiago and a team block by Panoff and Richardson. UMass would not trail in the game and when it appeared that the Bonnies were closing in, UMas tightened up the defense. "Nothing hits the floor," co-captain Nancy Sullivan, who played the leadership role very well, said to Panoff.

Then, with Rachel Bredemeir serving, UMass would win their finest point of the match, The Bonnies tipped the ball abotu six feet in front of Sullivan, who dove for the ball and fisted it over the net. Everyone knew it would fall, and when it did there was joy in Mudville as UMass had won its first match.

Looking up at the scoreboard one last time, it read "Home 15, Visitor 12." Let's take care of that scoreboard.

Tailback Vince (not Bo) Jackson, who saw a lot of action (17 carries, 81 yards and three touchdowns), finished the drive that put BU up for good with a 4-yard sweep right.

After an exchange of interceptions gave UMass the ball, tailback Jerome Bledsoe eventually committed the first of his three fumbles on the day, setting up BU for Jackson's second touchdown, again from four yards, and a 21-7 edge.

"I was shocked when I started to fumble," said Bledsoe, who managed 101 yards on 12 carries and a touchdown. "It's a mental thing. You have to try not to think about it."

And when it wasn't fumbles, it was blocked kicks coming back to haunt again. Gabrielli got stuffed for the second time, the ball rolling all the way back to the UMass 16 as BU recovered.

Two plays later, it was Greene hitting flanker Bryan Graves on a great diving grab at the back of the endzone. By now the writing was clearly on the wall at 28-7, UMass wasn't moving and BU wasn't stopping.

"Other than a couple of tipped balls, we never stopped them," Reid said. "It was like they were throwing against air."

Greene completed 30 of 47 passes on the day for 299 yards and a touchdown. He was intercepted twice, but came up with the big play time and again, finding either surehanded Daren Altieri (11 catches) or speedy Darvell Huffman open somewhere.

A 29-yard field goal by Mike Brown upped it to 31-7 in the third quarter before UMass finally got one back. Bledsoe returned the kickoff 22 yards, and then three plays later broke free on a pitchout right and scooted 44 yards down the sideline.

Another Brown field goal (21 yards) pushed it to 34-13 to end the third quarter and then Jackson capped his day with a 2-yard TD run. Sophomore Lawrence Hicks got the last UMass score, a 2-yarder in the game's final minute.

Reds tie UConn, top HC

By RICK SETO
Collegian Staff

Yesterday was deemed "Spirit Day" to raise some support for the UMass Reds, and it was appropriate considering the spirit the Reds showed in their weekend matches. UMass whitewashed Holy Cross 6-0 yesterday after tying Connecticut in a great 1-1 game Friday.

Hats off to April Kater (literally) as she exploded out of her offensive shell, scoring thrice and assisting on another goal for good measure. The All-America midfielder upped her season totals to five goals and four assists for 14 points to lead the team.

Minutemen split in tourney

By ADRIENNE MATT
Collegian Staff

This weekend the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team hosted the Massachusetts Challenge Cup Tournament at Upper Boyden. UMass came away second in the tournament. The tournament works on a point system by virtue of goal difference, then goals for.

On Saturday, UMass hosted the Colonials of George Washington on the Hill. George Washington entered the tournament with the most impressive season record at 6-1. The game started as fast-paced as your eyes could follow. Fifteen minutes into the game, senior Tom Skiba took a shot on the goal, only to be deflected off the hands of Colonial goalie Harry Bargmann. Sophomore Dan Lawrence, realizing the ball was under his feet, facing midfield in the box, gently kicked the ball into the bottom of the net with his right heel.

Two and a half minutes later on a breakaway, UMass sophomore Ray Cunha pulled down the right side of the field to chip in a shot to the bottom left corner of the net fed to him by junior Pete McEvoy and sophomore Brett Anthony. UMass was up 2-0.

During a scramble for possession in the UMass box, GW freshman Chris Majewski assisted sophomore Mario Lone to score eight minutes left in the half. The score at halftime remained 2-1.

"We started sluggish in the first half," said George Washington head coach George Lidster. "They punished us well, by scoring early then scoring again. It was important for us to score in the first half."

"We realized we had them beat," said UMass head coach Jeff Gettler. "In the second half George Washington fed on our mental fatigue. We had marking problems and we lost our composure."

The Colonials dominated the second half. Most of the possession was attained in midfield. GW freshman Renzo Massa scored unassisted, again from a scramble in the box three minutes left in the game. A minute and a half later Lone scored assisted by sophomore Khalid Jiha as GW rallied to end the game 3-2.

UMass completed the game with 20 shots on goal, compared to GW's 26. Bargmann ended the game with 13 saves, UMass freshman Steve Armenti had nine.

"In the second half, we were too defensive-minded. We became tenative," said Gettler. "We weren't creating chances. They created chances because they were playing as if they had nothing to lose."

"UMass has had bad luck this season," said Lidster. "They fought hard. They haven't given up yet this year, as demonstrated by today's play. They deserved to win this game."

Yesterday proved to be a better day for the Minutemen as they faced the University of Delaware who had experienced a 3-0 loss to Boston University the day before. Both teams needed to put their losses behind them. UMass was able to recover, Delaware was not.

Delaware entered this weekend's Cup with a season record of 2-3-1. Their opponents included Eastern College (W, 2-0), Washington College (W, 4-0), Elizabethtown College (L, 2-0), Towson State University (T, 0-0), Lehigh University (L, 4-0) and Rider College (L, 2-1).

UMass possessed the midfield and was able to feed the ball to its attack. Delaware is not a physically aggressive team, nor are they offensively confident, as yesterday's results proved. Fifteen minutes into regulation, senior Steve Cesnek and Anthony combined to feed Cunha for the first goal of the game. The score remained 1-0 for the first half.

"Today we thought we could even things up, given UMass' season record," said Delaware head coach Loren Kline. "but the momentum of the game belonged to UMass."

"It was nice to get an early goal," said Gettler. "We made a tremendous recovery for today [Sunday]. This was an opportunity to mentally put yesterday behind us."

The second half was a battle at midfield, but again UMass had the upper hand. With 11 minutes left in the game, Lawrence assisted Anthony to finish the scoring at 2-0. UMass outshot Deleware 42-16. Armenti had three saves compared to Delaware freshman Mark Puican who finished with eight. Deleware is currently 2-5-1 for the season. UMass is now 2-6-1.

"We've been struggling to score all year," said Kline. "The disappointment was upfront. We had no offensive thrust."

"We needed a shutout," Gettler said. "We held the lead then got another [goal]. It enabled us to go deep into the bench.

"It was a strong, solid effort. Everybody contributed," said Gettler. "I saw a gutty performance, a team performance."

Terriers put the bite on Minutemen, 41-19

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — This game could have just as easily been played down the road a few miles in Foxboro.

Crucial injuries on both sides of the ball, blocked punts, fumbles, missed blocking assignments, the possibility of a quarterback change. Isn't this the soap opera that the Patriots have been playing out this season?

Well, this malady also bit the University of Massachusetts square on the nose Saturday, with all of the above contributing to a 41-19 loss to Boston University at Nickerson Field.

The Terriers (1-3) really needed a win after losing their first three games by a total of nine points, including the last two by a point apiece. The fire was in their eyes from the start and they took it to their guests, running up a 28-7 halftime edge.

"This is a monkey off our backs," said BU coach Chris Palmer. "We played well against Dartmouth, but we had a gut check this week. We showed a lot of character."

"BU played an excellent football game," said UMass coach Jim Reid. "You could tell they were taking their frustrations out. We didn't block anybody in the first half, and we didn't throw real well."

The lights started to dim right from the get-go for UMass. As Yogi said, "it was like deja vu all over again" on the first UMass drive of the game. When three plays didn't produce a first down, Marco Gabrielli went back to punt and was blocked, BU recovering on the 33 after it rolled five yards forward.

Last week, Maine blocked Gabrielli's punt on the first drive and took it in immediately for a score. BU failed to capitalize on this one, Rich Kane recovering a fumble after Matt Tulley bulldozed quarterback Stan Greene from behind.

But the Minutemen (1-2-1) came up empty and after a punt, BU drove to paydirt behind their vaunted Run and Shoot offense. Despite claims that the Terriers were basically a passing team, they did a lot of running as well as shooting, a balance that kept UMass off stride for most of the game.

How good was BU at moving the ball? Consider that they didn't face third down (let alone fourth) until about 11 minutes remained in the second quarter. Oy.

After some running and passing, Greene's 3-yard keeper gave BU the early lead, 7-0, but the Minutemen came right back as Roger Baldacci (11-for-21, 150 yards, two interceptions) hit Ron Blauvelt with a perfect post pattern timing toss in the back of the endzone, knotting the score at 7-all.

It looked good at that point, but would get progressively uglier, the Terriers running off 24 unanswered points to seal it.

The scoreboard says it: volleyball gets first win

By DAN SARAZEN
Collegian Staff

Possibly the best way to sum up the University of Massachusetts volleyball team's weekend would be to steal a line from Chuck Dickens: "It was the best of times; it was the worst of times."

The worst of times came Friday night as 15th-ranked Penn State met the Minutewomen at Totman Gym. It was the classic tale of David and Goliath, and as will happen 99 times out of 100, David got beat up and Penn State swept, 3-0.

However, it was not a dejected team that took the floor against St. Bonaventure Saturday. In what was a very exciting match, UMass came back from a 2-1 deficit to win the last two games and beat the Bonnies, 15-8, 4-15, 7-15, 16-14 and 15-12, the team's first win of the year.

UMass started out hot in the first game as Sharon Panoff scored the first two points, one off a block and the second on a tip that eluded the St. Bonaventure back row. The Minutewomen would go on to score the next eight points and lead 10-0.

Just when it looked like things were going to be easy, the Bonnies called a timeout to organize themselves. It worked to a degree as they scored the next six to cut it to 10-6. But the Minutewomen could not be stopped and took the game.

After that first game a strange thing happened. The scoreboard broke as the home team's score would not go higher than 10. The announcer quickly pulled a chalkboard over and for the next two games would scribble down the score.

And just as quickly as the clock broke down, so did the Minutewomen, losing the next two games. But if the first three games were mediocre, the last two were worth the price of scalped Stones tickets.

Panoff and Sue Richardson got the crowd into the game, Panoff with a kill and Richardson with a save that she got to on the run about a foot in front of the official scorer. The lead changed hands six times

In other UMass sports action . . .

Because of deadline restraints, results from this weekend's field hockey and water polo action could not be included. The field hockey team beat St. Joseph's, 5-0 Saturday before losing to Penn State yesterday, 1-0. The water polo team was at the Fordham Tournament. Check tomorrow's Collegian for results.

In UMass sports action today, the men's tennis team, 3-1 and coming off a big win at Boston University last Wednesday, will travel to Providence for a 3:30 p.m. match.

Demonstrators march to protest cutbacks

By NATHAN KRYSTALL
Collegian Staff

More than 300 demonstrators braved yesterday's wet conditions to protest continued cutbacks at the University of Massachusetts.

The rally, which was organized by the Massachusetts Society of Professors, began at noon at the Whitmore administration building.

The demonstrators then marched to the Student Union Building and back to Whitmore, allowing more people to join the procession. As they marched, the protesters chanted "Hey hey, ho ho, budget cuts have got to go."

Professor John Cole, president of the MSP, said the rally was being held in conjunction with "A Day of Conscience," a nationwide effort protesting the condition of public education in Massachusetts.

When the rally returned to Whitmore, several speakers took turns addressing the crowd from the railing of the Whitmore ramp.

Jules Chemetzky, the acting chairman of the English department, berated the state legislature and Gov. Dukakis for their lack of attention to public education.

"We should stop saying please to the governor for his stupidity and arrogance," Chemetzky said.

Amherst lawyer Jim Collins, former Massachusetts chancellor of Education, agreed, drawing a parallel between yesterday's weather and the legislature's policies.

"The policies coming out of Boston are truly all wet," Collins said.

He said education in Massachusetts bears a disproportionate share of the budget cuts — education was cut by over 40 percent last year, but it was only allocated less than 20 percent of the state budget.

Frank Annunziato, an assistant professor at the UMass Labor Relations and Research Center, lambasted "the corporate apologists who dominate the [UMass] administration for their insensitivity to the poor and working people of the commonwealth.

Annunziato said the Labor Center's director was told by the administration that the center "was not central to the mission of the university" after its budget was cut "astronomically" this year.

"To the mentality of the [UMass] administration which worships daily at the sacred altar of the high-tech council," he said, "empowerment of working class people can only be understood as marginal to the central mission of their secret kind of university."

Ed Harris, who directed the University Without Walls program for 16 years, said the cutbacks indicate "a pattern of excluding diverse populations."

UWW, which caters to non-traditional and students who work full time, was cut by 48 percent this year, Harris said.

Jack Lockhead, who headed the Basic Math Program before it was eliminated, said cutting his program saved the state $165,000, but that it had generated $500,000 in federal grant support.

"Maybe the governor doesn't know that 500,000 is a bigger number than 165,000," Lockhead said.

Bob Biaggi, who was recently fired from the UMass Extension Service along with more than 50 others, said outreach programs are the future of Massachusetts.

"People who cut things like [the extension service] can't see the future." Biaggi said.

Sandra Morgan, an assistant professor of Women's Studies, said she was concerned about the future of nontenured faculty, who compose 25 percent of UMass' faculty.

"We're the future," Morgan said. "We don't want to be expendable."

Woman to be remembered at pro-choice memorial service

By KATERI WALSH
Collegian Staff

12 years ago today, Rosie Jimenez, a 27-year-old college student, just six months shy of graduation, died of complications incurred during an illegal abortion, according to John Ziccone of People For Choice. She was the first known woman to die after the passage of the Hyde Amendment which made Medicaid funding of abortions illegal, said Zicconi.

Tonight at 7, Jimenez, the single mother of a five-year-old daughter at the time of her death, will be remembered at simultaneous events at the five colleges in the area.

Jimenez, because of a lack of money, was forced to choose between paying for a medically safe abortion by a doctor, or paying for her college classes. She has since emerged as a symbol of the pro-choice struggle to keep abortion not only legal, but also federally funded, Ziccone said.

People for Choice member Stephanie Haskins said that the memorial service on the campus pond tonight will include a vigil with 50 candles being lit, one to represent each state and the women who have died unnecessary deaths. The group will erect a tombstone, and a sermon will be given by minister Carole Ann Camp. Andre Delgado will translate the sermon to Spanish. There will also be singing and poetry, said Marci Lew, also a member of People For Choice.

"I think Jimenez would approve of us using her name to help the cause that she obviously believed in," Ziccone said.

People For Choice will have a table on the Campus Center Concourse all day tomorrow and will be distributing black armbands to anyone interested in showing support for the pro-choice cause.

Steel bar strikes student as support wall collapses

By MICHELLE LOCKE
The Associated Press

NORTH ADAMS, Mass. — Two students, including one impaled by a three-foot long steel bar, were injured yesterday when a brick stairwell wall collapsed at a North Adams State College dormitory, police said.

North Adams Commissioner of Public Safety Arthur Kelly said Steven F. Pugliese, 19, of Belmont, was impaled by a steel railing support bar that penetrated his upper chest and shoulder joint when the wall collapsed on the outdoor 3 1/2-story stairwell.

Emergency medical teams had to dig him out of the rubble and cut loose a portion of the steel bar, using a special saw, Kelly said. Pugliese, who remained conscious throughout the ordeal, was taken to North Adams Regional Hospital with about two feet of the bar still protruding from his chest, Kelly said.

Kelly said Derek T. Maddalena, a second student on the outside stairwell when it collapsed about 2:15 p.m. was taken to the hospital with head injuries.

Hospital spokeswoman Ann Rich said Maddalena, 19 of East Boston, was treated and released. Pugliese underwent emergency surgery to remove the rod. He was listed in stable condition last night, a hospital spokeswoman said.

The complex is a group of about 20 two- and three-story buildings that resemble apartments. By late afternoon, police had boarded up the stairwell, but a pile of broken bricks lay on the ground in front of the stairs.

A few students wandered by the building, casting curious glances at the yellow tape barring access.

Four legged friends assist hearing impaired masters

By KERRY HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

Daisy, a fuzzy poodle mutt with big brown eyes, is not a typical social service worker.

But yesterday, during a presentation in the Student Union ballroom, Daisy presented an essential side of social service unique to her abilities.

Daisy, a hearing ear dog, is from the Red Acre Farm Hearing Dog Center, a non-profit organization which trains and places dogs in the homes of hearing impaired people.

The dogs are trained to alert their owners of things they are unable to detect, such as fire alarms, tea kettles, microwave buzzers, a baby's cry, knocks on doors, telephone rings or any other sounds the person may need to be aware of.

Adele Polk, a placement counselor at the center, demonstrated Daisy's abilities yesterday as part of "Disabilities Awareness Week" at the University of Massachusetts.

Red Acre Farm searches pounds and animal shelters all over the state looking for dogs which are intelligent, have a high level of curiosity, and are highly sensitive to vital sounds of living said Adele Polk, a placement counselor at the center.

During the demonstration, Polk showed the small audience Daisy's ability to detect a sound, contact her owner and show the owner where the sound is coming from.

The dogs are trained to hear certain sounds on the basis of what the person's needs are, she said. All dogs are trained to respond to a fire alarm.

When the dogs hear an alarm, for instance, they go to their owners and jump on them. The dogs then lie down to show the owner what the noise is. They are trained to continue to alert the hearing impaired person until he or she reacts.

"You have to love dogs because the dog and the [hearing impaired] person have to work as a team," Polk said. "There is a lot of physical contact. The dog provides companionship and security besides serving as a guide."

Approximately 84 dogs from the center have been placed in homes of the hearing impaired all over the country, Polk said. Clients from as far as Texas have been satisfied with this service, she said.

Although there are no students at UMass who use this service, Polk said it is available for interested students.

"We are always looking to expand," she said. "I hope that we can serve students here if there is interest."

The demonstration and an all-day resource fair was sponsored by the Office of Handicapped Student Affairs in conjunction with "National Disability Month," according to Paul Appleby, director.

Events for Disability Awareness week will continue at 8 tonight with the Edwin M. Rossman Alumni Career Forum in room 804 of the Campus Center.

The UMass alumni scheduled to speak include — Tori Grennier-Eklund, a therapist at Westfield Area Mental Health Clinic; Carla Kszaszcz-Heath, a Pediatric Registered Nurse at Yale New Haven Hospital in Connecticut; Theresa King, a senior administrator in a division of the Bank of New England West in West Springfield; and James Wice, assistant director of the Disabled Students Center at UMass/Boston.

"The alumni are coming to discuss with students what discrimination, some subtle, some not so subtle, they have found because of their disability," Appleby said.

A performance by folksinger Les Nichols is scheduled for 10 a.m. in Campus Center room 811b-15.

On Thursday, Matthew Engel of the Disability Law Center will lecture in the Campus Center on "Legal Rights of the Disabled."

Appleby stressed that the activities scheduled for this week are open to everyone, not just disabled students.

"Legal rights of the disabled are important not just for those who are disabled, but for people who work alongside them and those who advocate for their rights," he said.

Appleby said that although this awareness week is important, integrating disabled students into the academic and social life of UMass is more important.

"I hope this week will show some response of awareness," Appleby said. "But, having disabled students in classes and dorm rooms are far more effective than any kind of response we can bring."

Student members of Town Meeting miss sessions

By PAUL MORRIS
Collegian Staff

The 14 University of Massachusetts undergraduates listed as Amherst Town Meeting members have attended a combined 22 percent of the sessions since last May, and drawn some criticism from voters and Town Meeting members.

The excessive absences raise doubts the members are serving their constituents, said Select Board member Fredrick Rice.

"As a Town Meeting member you have an obligation to go to meetings, debate and vote — or you quit," he said.

The student members were marked present 31 times out of a possible 140. The other 241 Town Meeting members were present 1,834 times in 2,410 opportunities or 76 percent of the time. This year's nine-session Town Meeting ran from May 1 to May 25 and a Special Town Meeting was held Sept 20. Nine of the students are from the precinct 10 Greek Area.

David S. Shulman, an Alpha Epsilon Pi member who was marked present at four of 10 sessions, said he ran for Town Meeting because he believed the students needed more of a voice in Amherst Town government. Most of the Greek Area students were serving their first term and did not fully understand the time commitment involved, he said.

"I originally thought the Annual Town Meeting was one session," he said. "The entire two-week process was during exam time and a lot of the students had to study."

Select Board Chair Edith Wilkinson said she realizes students were busy with exams but said a lot went home after the tests while the sessions were ongoing.

"Town Meeting is the basis of the democratic process in this town," she said. "Members should be there and vote."

Pro-choicers mobilize

By AARATHI REDDY
Collegian Correspondent

Sparked in opposition to July's US Supreme Court abortion decision, which granted restrictive power to states, the pro-choice movement has begun to mobilize in the five-college area.

Marlene Fried, of the Civil Liberties and Public Policy Program at Hampshire College, lectured to some 30 women on the importance of reproductive freedom at last Thursday's meeting of the Progressive Women's Network.

The network was formed two years ago as a support group for women. It serves as a forum to discuss various issues relevant to women.

Fried has worked with the Reproductive Rights Network and the Abortion Rights Fund of Western Massachusetts to further educate and mobilize the public about reproductive rights.

Because of recent Supreme Court rulings restricting abortion, Fried said involvement in the pro-choice movement is needed now more than ever.

She went on to discuss the lack of federal funding which prevents many women who do not want children from seeking an abortion.

Senate elections to be held again

Elections for representation to the Undergraduate Student Senate from Southwest, Commuter and Greek areas are scheduled to be rerun tomorrow.

Elections for Southwest senators will open in the Berkshire Dining Commons and Hampshire Dining Commons during dining hours.

Commuter area constituents will be able to vote at the Hatch cafeteria in the Student Union building. Polls for Greek area residents will be in the Newman Center.

The elections are being rerun because of several procedural errors made during initial voting last week, including the misspelling of candidates' names.

Senate Speaker John Dunlap said the election, which is being coordinated once again by Ross Condit, will be better staffed by volunteers, a lack which plagued the initial elections last week.

Mecke Nagel, a UMass graduate student who voted in the tenth precinct last April, said a lot of Amherst voters believe that permanent residents are more responsible Town Meeting members because they have more invested in the community.

Peter Vaz, a Pi Kappa Alpha member who was marked present at one meeting, said he left Amherst before the Town Meetings ended to work so he could pay for school.

"I don't think that my absence meant much to the meeting as a whole," he said.

Vaz, who has two years left on his term, said if he cannot find the time to go to the sessions, he may resign before the 1990 Town Meeting in April.

Shulman, who also has two years left, said that he will make a greater effort to attend more meetings in the future.

THOUSANDS WANT U.S. VISAS — As many as 16,000 people hoping to emigrate to the United States lined up around the U.S. embassy in Moscow to receive applications yesterday. The line formed yesterday, and to keep their places, they held numbers. The embassy ran out of applications before all could receive one.

Bonn to arrange for more East German refugees

BONN (AP) — Bonn says it is trying to arrange passage to the West for hundreds more East German refugees converging on Prague and Warsaw now that East Berlin has allowed trainloads of their compatriots to emigrate.

In mid-September, East Germany's Communist leaders registered fierce protests when Hungary's liberal leaders opened their border to the West and thousands of East Germans fled.

But this weekend East Berlin actually agreed to allow another wave in the exodus after the grounds of West Germany's embassy in Prague, Czechoslovakia, had become a crowded, muddy encampment for hundreds of East German refugees.

On Friday, Mikhail S. Gorbachev is expected in East Berlin to help commemorate 40 years of Communist rule in a country that has already lost more than 100,000 people to the westward exodus this year.

About 7,000 East German refugees, many weeping with joy, pulled into West German train stations early Sunday after a deal was worked out to clear Bonn's embassies in Prague and Warsaw, Poland, of sanctuary seekers.

Some said they jumped aboard the freedom trains as they passed through East Germany. Their country's hard-line leaders had agreed to the exodus on condition the refugees travel to the West via their homeland, an arrangement that allowed East Berlin to say they were being "expelled."

East Germany also said, however, that it acted for "humanitarian" reasons.

Czechoslovak authorities had, in solidarity with a fellow reform-resistant ally, refused to let the refugees go without East Berlin's permission.

Poland's new non-Communist leadership handled the situation cautiously but praised East Germany after the exodus for showing "high flexibility."

Blacks demand clemency for two ANC guerillas

JOHANNESBURG (AP) — About 25,000 blacks demanded clemency for two condemned African National Congress guerrillas today in the largest protest march ever held in one of South Africa's nominally independent tribal homelands.

The marchers, most of them schoolchildren, paraded peacefully through the center of Umtata, the capital of Transkei.

Some carried African National Congress flags and displayed placards urgent he release of two members of the guerrilla movement who are on death row in Transkei for a 1986 bombing which killed two people at the Wild Coast sun, a posh gambling resort overlooking the Indian Ocean.

The homeland's official radio estimated the crowd at 25,000 and said police did not interfere.

Bakker testifies PTL board gave him bonuses despite financial problems

CHARLOTTE (AP) – TV evangelist Jim Bakker testified today in his fraud trial that the board members of his PTL ministry were "totally aware" of financial problems but continued to give him huge bonuses anyway.

"They would tell me they were happy to do this," Bakker said during cross-examination by special prosecutor Deborah Smith. "They would tell me I was worth much more than this and they would say that over and over again."

Ms. Smith contended Bakker failed to tell PTL board members about the ministry's money problems, and asked if he was contradicting testimony from six board members who testified Bakker never told them about financial problems.

"I would tell them we were in great financial need. They were always up to date on all the financial information," Bakker said.

It was Bakker's second day on the stand. He started testifying Friday and was under cross-examination when court adjourned for the weekend. The government could put on rebuttal witnesses after Bakker before closing arguments send the case to the jury, probably this week.

Bakker didn't help his case Friday when he repeatedly testified that he didn't remember details of his ministry's finances, his lawyer said.

"That was a pretty heavy cross-examination," defense attorney George Davis said of Bakker's testimony last week. "It was very damaging, very devastating."

Bakker is charged with 24 counts of fraud and conspiracy, accused of diverting most of the $158 million in donations he raised to build lodging at his religious retreat and theme park, and using some of the funds to support a lavish lifestyle for himself and his wife, Tammy.

Medicare hangs in the balance as Congress considers repealing aid

WASHINGTON (AP) – The fate of Medicare catastrophic health care coverage for 33 million Americans hangs in the balance as Congress considers repealing the program to cool the "blast furnace heat" of angry senior citizens.

House Speaker Thomas S. Foley predicted Sunday the House probably will vote this week to repeal the program that it enacted only last year.

"I hope personally that the program is retained in a modified form," Foley, D-Wash., said on NBC's 'Meet the Press' program.

"But ... there are a great number of Republicans and some Democrats in the House who are in favor of repeal. If I were guessing today, I think it probably would be repealed." Votes also may occur this week in the Senate.

The program's defenders have launched a last-ditch effort to save it by pushing a revision that would scrap major features of the program, cancel the unpopular surtax that helps finance it, and retain new prescription drug benefits scheduled to begin in January.

"We;re on the hear-lung machine trying to keep the program going," said John Rother, legislative director of the American Association for Retired Persons. "but it's obvious that some major changes are going to have to be made."

The Medicare Catastrophic coverage Act is aimed at providing protection for the elderly and disabled against financial ruin in the event of a prolonged hospital stay or other high medical costs.

The plan limits the amount that beneficiaries must pay for hospital care, physician services, medical supplies and prescription drugs and expands other health care benefits as well.

Survey: freshmen look to grad school

BOSTON (AP) – A majority of college freshmen consider their bachelor's degree a step toward graduate school, while education rivals business as their job goals, according to a newspaper survey of 900 students in the class of 1993 at New England colleges.

"There's a feeling you can't do much with a liberal arts bachelor's degree," of the Graduate School of Arts and Sciences at Harvard University told The Boston Sunday Globe.

Maher added, "It's sort of a necessary base, but it's not sufficient for gaining entry into a professional career."

The Boston Globe-KRC Research survey fielded the opinions of freshmen at a dozen public and private colleges in Connecticut, Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Vermont. It included no margin of error because it was a sampling rather than a scientific poll, the paper said.

The survey showed that 82 percent of the freshmen have an idea of what they want to do after college.

Business drew the interest of 23 percent , while education has 16 percent, law and government work showed 14 percent each.

Communications and medicine each were cited by 12 percent of freshmen surveyed as their chief career interest. Engineering was the goal of 5 percent, while computers, environmental fields and the arts had 3 percent each.

On choosing a career, 79 percent of the students, who could list more than one answer, said their interest in education was in finding "personal fulfillment and enjoyment," while 25 percent said they wanted a good salary and 24 percent sought to help improve the lives of others.

On a similar question where they could give more than one answer, 53 percent said college was a step to further educational goals, 37 percent wanted a liberal arts education and 21 percent sought from college the skills to get a job.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted

Closer than you think

You are a college aged female who has just discovered that you are pregnant. You and your boyfriend do not want to get married. You both have big career plans and are not yet ready to have children.

Meredith O'Brien

You made a mistake one night, and if you both are students in Louisiana, the course of your lives will be decided for you. You will have the baby and suffer the consequences.

You are an anxious husband in the delivery room where your wife has been in labor for six hours. It isn't going well and the doctors have asked you to leave the room. Ten minutes later a doctor comes out of the delivery room to tell you that your wife's life has to be sacrificed for the baby's. He says he's sorry, but that's the law, here in Louisiana.

Yesterday, the Supreme Court began its new term. It was this court that decided the case of Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, rendering the final decision on abortion to be left up to each individual state.

It was this decision that could make a pending Louisiana law a harsh fact in that state, possibly setting the precedent for a great number of states.

This week a federal court in New Orleans is hearing a case where the prosecutor is trying to enforce a 134-year-old state law banning all abortions, including those performed in order to save the life of the mother.

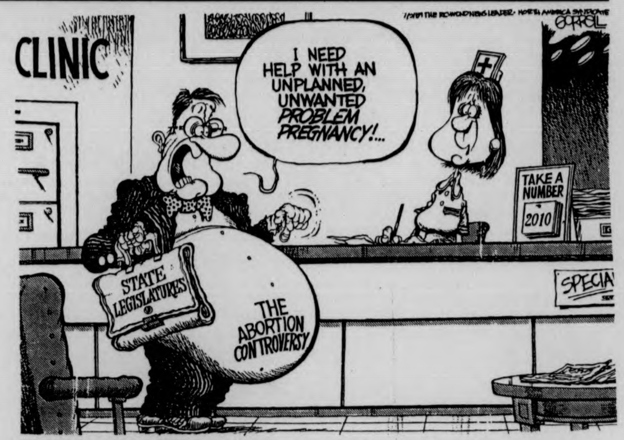
This issue may seem far, far away. It can't touch us, can't affect us. Abortion will always be debated. It will always be one of those tired issues that people talk about, write about, "Not another article about abortion . . ."

The disturbing fact is that not only is this issue very emotional, but it's very powerful. Not many people really sit down and think about what such a ruling could do to their future.

How many women on this campus get pregnant each year, whether it be through recklessness, ignorance, or failure of contraception? Even a couple practicing "safe sex" can be the victims of a failed contraceptive product. Nothing guarantees that unwanted pregnancies will not result, even if you are acting responsibly.

People can preach about giving up a child for adoption, but they really don't think about what happens to the mother's life while she is pregnant.

How many UMass women would be forced to carry out their pregnancy, regardless of career aspirations, graduation, or lack of money to care for a newborn?



How many UMass men would be forced to give up their future plans to get married early, to care and pay for a newborn, or to sacrifice their education as well?

How many of us plan to get married in the future, to have children, to bask in the anxious anticipation of a baby? How many men can picture themselves being told by a doctor that their wives lives must be terminated to save their baby, because the law says that she must die?

Louisiana may seem like it's far away, in the distance. Someplace that we can just think about and forget. But what happens down there, has a good chance of happening here or wherever you live in this country.

You may be forced to think about Louisiana only after it's too late.

UMass — a look into the future

Nov. 4, 1989

Mother: How could you, the department of public safety, allow my daughter to get raped? How could you?

Officer: Ma'am, I'm sorry. We try our best; with the escort service gone it's very difficult.

Mother: Gone?

Officer: The budget cuts have. . .

Mother: Budget cuts? Budget cuts? My daughter has been raped!

David R. Mark

Sept. 4, 1990

Tour guide: Welcome to the University of Massachusetts. Thank you for considering our fine school. As you can see, the campus is quite large, having been built-up heavily in the 1960s and 1970s. On your left is the new Mullins Arena, home of the UMass Minuteman Hockey Team. The Arena is to be finished in 1993.

Crowd: Ooh, aah.

Tour Guide: . . . Here is the Tower Library, the tallest. . .

Mr. Smith: What's that sign say?

Tour guide: Oh, that? (Looks nervously over shoulder) That says, "Don't Cut Off Circulation . . . FUND Our LIBRARIES."

Mr. Smith: What does that mean?

Tour guide: Well, um . . . it means we need more money for books and library staff, which by the way is the tallest. . .

Mr. Smith (with son in tow): You have money for a hockey arena but not for the library!? Where are your priorities!? (They leave)

Tour guide: But sir, we received a state grant for the arena . . .

April 4, 1991

Mrs. Jones: My daughter wants to be a Japanese major at UMass, but when she was accepted last month, the form said she'd have to pick a new major. Why?

Admissions officer: I'm sorry, Mrs. Jones, but we are phasing out the Japanese major.

Mrs. Jones: Why?

Admissions officer: Because of the budget cuts.

Mrs. Jones: But I've seen articles about the new hockey arena, the new visitor's center and the pay raise Franklyn Jenifer took. How'd you have money for all that?

Admissions officer: Well, we only have so much money, and we've gotten state grants for those other buildings. . .

Sept. 4, 1993

Chancellor Duffey: Though the Mullins Arena has been completed, we do not have any scholarship money this year for players. Therefore we will not have a team this year.

Oct. 3, 1989

David R. Mark: The budget cuts aren't the only thing destroying the University of Massachusetts. The people deciding what gets cut are destroying us too.

Off-campus living: Visions of freedom?

Well, now that I have finally become a junior, I can proudly say that I have achieved a very prestigious honor — one that is unmatched by any other. The University has come to respect my maturity. I'm at the tender age of twenty, which to the housing office means responsibility.

Erin Martin

I am lucky enough to have had the opportunity to move off-campus. Sounds wonderful, huh? I can cook my own food, pay my own bills, and dish out over two hundred dollars a month for rent.

Whether or not this off-campus option is so terrific remains to be seen. Don't get me wrong, my "housemates" are terrific. We share responsibilities and cook for each other once a week. But the vision of freedom I imagined is not quite how I pictured it.

People keep telling me how lucky I am to be living off-campus. At first I thought I'd be missing the advantages of communal living and all the fun I had in the Southwest dorms.

There was always the Monday morning shower gossip where I learned a lot about the girls on my floor. I can honestly say that by the end of the semester, we shared more than just the bathroom and the lounge. I also had the opportunity to wander down the hall whenever I needed help in a particular class.

But living in Coolidge was not all that it was cracked up to be either. My car was parked a mile away in E-Lot. I dreaded working weeknights because the walk in from the lot at 10pm terrified me. I also lived on the 21st floor. The elevator at 8:45 am stopped on every floor. By the time I reached the ground, my shirt was wrinkled, my make-up smudged, and I had eaten some other girl's hair for breakfast.

I understand now that the dorms have become incredibly strict. There are roommate contracts, a limit to how many guests can be signed into an entire building, and worst of all — single sex bathrooms.

I lived on an all girls floor, but guys in our bathroom was never a big deal. I hear from friends living on coed floors that they have to walk up one or two floors to shower. I do not like walking in the tower stairwells fully clothed, never mind in just a bathrobe.

There usually wasn't much traffic in those stairwells. My roommate was once "tickle-tortured" by a male friend of ours in that stairwell. She screamed bloody murder and no one came to help her. What if the situation wasn't a game? How do you defend yourself when you are walking through a stairwell in a bathrobe?

Maybe it seems a little extreme, but it could happen, couldn't it? So, I guess the fact that I have my own bath and a half in my apartment is cause enough to like living off-campus. But, I've found that instead of packing onto an elevator every morning, I pack onto a PVTA bus. The conditions are the same, and my breakfast diet hasn't changed much.

I signed a roommate contract, too. Only mine was with my landlord, and I bet the list of don'ts is much longer than the one in the dorms. Kegs are illegal where I live, too. The number of people allowed in my apartment is limited to twelve. We have security in our parking lot on weekends. And when my roommate cooks hot dogs it's more lethal than anything you could ever eat in the DC.

I'm just opening your eyes to some of the misconceptions people have about living off-campus. It has definitely worked out better for me. I'm having a terrific time this year. My car is parked right outside my door, and what's best of all? I have call-waiting and MTV. The dorms won't have that for another year.

Exploitation of business conditions is racist

In "Have a Coke and Smile," (Sept. 28) Jim Clark advocates a very specific anti-apartheid strategy: reform. He implicitly lauds corporate America for providing job opportunities for Black South Africans. His arguments against divestment are the same as those used by Pretoria and Corporate America.

The fact is that legislatively sanctioned lower wages for Africans, violent oppression of their labor unions, and an incredibly limited amount of potential economic mobility render these points moot. American business capital has always shifted to locations which promise higher profitability (eg. lower wages/less organized labor). Corporate America is in South Africa to exploit the business conditions created by the racist system of apartheid.

By giving credence to investor's claims of providing opportunity, Clark has chosen the path of racist-controlled reform. The disenfranchised majority knows this to be a farce and have called for divestment. The system and "culture" of apartheid is a construct of the brutally anti-democratic white government.

The reasons for targeting Coke rather than other companies are varied. Clark mentions another corporation that has refused to pull out like IBM. As people buy Coke more frequently than computers, the choice of Coke is one based on possible effectiveness. Clark alludes to another factor in the choice of Coke; we simply cannot boycott everything lest "we'd by sitting out in the cold, naked and starving to death."

If Clark is suggesting that we abandon boycotts as a weapon for justice, I would urge him to accept a little more of his global and national responsibility. Indeed the trite terms in which the issue was discussed by Clark have left a bad taste in my mouth.

Apartheid is a brutal and oppressive machine that pervades every aspect of South African life. Divestment works to chip away at the foundations of this system. The Coke boycott is a massive national movement. When it achieves Coke's divestment, it will have deprived South Africa's captors of tens of millions of tax dollars that would have otherwise continued to bolster the genocidal minority government.

To paraphrase the slogan of a major consumer advocacy organization, "We vote every day with our consumer dollars." Vote against apartheid!

"For a lot of people, having the right doesn't mean much without the funding," Fried said.

This lack of funding, coupled with Medicaid and numerous insurance companies' refusal to allott funds for family planning and abortions is damaging women's ability to exercise their rights, Fried said.

The Abortion Rights Fund, which provides abortion funding for low-income women and teenagers, has had their budget slashed by 35 percent during the past eight years, she said. International family planning funds were curtailed during the Reagan-Bush years as well, she added.

Many anti-abortion groups are attempting to pass legislation to limit the time period in which a woman may get an abortion, she said.

"It is every woman's right to seek an abortion, and this right should not be limited to a certain time period," she said.

The great remote control conspiracy revealed

By AL KAUFMAN
Collegian Staff

click

I used to like remote controls. I considered the inventor of the same caliber as the person who invented the sofa that I always lounged on in front of my TV. For now I never had to leave the piece of furniture that had already molded itself to the contours of my couch potato body.

When Married With Children broke for a commercial, all I had to do was use one finger, and I could watch Madonna grab her crotch on MTV.

I became glued to my sofa, getting up for only the occasional ice cream, Pop Tart, or Miller Lite (only because it tastes great). I merrily spent hours a day in front of my TV watching twelve shows at once and understanding none of them. All the while, my body sunk deeper and deeper into the couch.

Then it hit me. The remote control was turning my brain into day-old applesauce. So I began to leave the remote on top of the TV. Now that I had to get up and make that three foot trek across the room, I became more selective on what I watched because I didn't want to get up to change the station again. Eventually, I realized that most TV shows are made for brain-dead people, and I stopped watching altogether.

click

So I guess now I'm like those reformed smokers who tell everyone they see smoking that they are taking three minutes off of their lives per cancer stick. I can't help it.

I hate remote controls.

I hate it when I walk into someone's room where the TV happens to be on and just as I start to get into the story, click. It's gotten to the point where I'm beginning to feel sorry for remote controlaholics. For no longer are they confined solely to TV. Now they use remotes for their radios and CD players.

These people are a sorry sight to witness and are in great need of help. They sit in bed all day surrounded by globs of food, a telephone and the evil remote controls. They never leave their beds. They flip television stations unconsciously. They keep one CD in their stereo for weeks at a time, playing selected cuts, because they are too lazy to get up and switch discs.

Bedsores will be the latest affliction to wreak havoc among the people. Buy stock in any company that sells salves and lotions, for the demand is sure to skyrocket.

This tragedy will only get worse before it gets better. It may even be a conspiracy by some up and coming country to make us all fat and lazy so that they can take over. Soon you'll be able to remote control anything.

You'll be able to dial your phone, and speak in it, from across the room.

You'll be able to shut doors and turn off lights from the comfort of your own bed.

You won't have to make the long trek to E Lot to get your car. Just push a button and it will drive itself right up to your door.

We must put a stop to this lazy craze. I'm hardly one to go to a gym, or even run a mile or two just to get hot and sweaty and end up where I began, but I can walk across a room to change a channel.

But by now you're probably sick of listening to me, so before you do what I think you want to do, I'll save you the trouble.

Powerful accoustic soloist plays Sheehan's

By DAKKAN ABBE
Collegian Correspondent

Ari Vais
Sheehan's Cafe
Thursday, Sept. 28

Thursday night at Sheehan's Cafe, I had the opportunity to see Ari Vais in a very intimate environment. There were about forty people at the show, and no one went away disappointed. Vais gets a lot of sound out of his acoustic guitar, playing powerful rhythms that beg for a band, while simultaneously not needeing one.

Bassist Daisy Aaronian joined Vais on several tunes, most notably the Velvet Underground's "Femme Fatale," and the song they wrote together, "Down in the Basement." Her slow, smooth style matched his playing perfectly, and her beautiful voice gave the word "cool" new meaning.

Vais' originals are quite impressive, and often range from soft and melancholy, to hard an angry. Vais sings about depression, sadness, lonliness and anger, but he never loses his sense of humor through it all.

Between songs, he seemed comfortable and at ease, cracking jokes and poking fun at himself. The crowd was having a great time, getting drunk and listening to him sing what amounts to the "white man's blues."

The peak of the lengthy two and a half hour show came when he played the Velvet Underground classic, "Heroin." The song, while played similar to the band's live version, had passion and energy that one rarely sees in a solo acoustic show. The crowd went wild, then settled back into their seats for the rest of the show.

Vais went on to cover Neil Young's "Hey Hey, My My," and the Pixies' "Monkey Gone to Heaven."

The cave-like atmosphere at Sheehan's was a perfect host to Vais' underground sound, and I hope he gets a chance to play there again soon. He's too good to miss and will soon bring his passionate songs to the Hatch, with his new band Sound Pie.

Making the dorm into a new home

By PRESTON P. FORMAN

We go through this ritual every year. Experienced students tell us it is easier to leave the parents at home and do it by themselves. The rest of us, the more unfortunate, bring Mom and Dad to help us.

As they leave, the realization occurs that the most difficult part is still ahead; decorating. We need to make the ugly cell habitable. We bring in anything we can; posters, stereos, VCRs, refrigerators, computers, answering machines, microwaves, anything to make the cell our new home.

Craig Jackson, a freshman engineering major who lives in Northeast, thinks the most important consideration in a room is making it a part of yourself. "The stuff that means a lot to me, stuff that will make it relaxing and nice, I brought," he said.

Jackson said making a room comfortable also depends on the roommate. "We have radically different tastes in music," he said as he pointed to the Pink Floyd poster on one side of the room and the INXS poster on the other, "but we get along well."

Mammoth: big in size small in talent

By DANIELLE DOWLING
Collegian Staff

Mammoth
Mammoth
Jive/BMG/RCA

It never ceases to amaze me. Just when I think the music industry has stooped to the lowest point possible, it sinks lower. Take the humourous but sad tale of Mammoth, a band from England debuting on the commercial metal scene with their self titled LP. Whoever advised these guys on how to package and market themselves did a horrendous job because although this band seems to have at least some talent, it is lost in a sea of commercial fluff.

RECORD REVIEW

For the most part, the album's content is boring and predictable. There is not one song that is even tolerable. The vocals follow the same melody line in every song. The bass and drum lines are repetative to say the least and the guitar parts are flowery and show-offish. If I had a dollar for every commercial metal guitarist who consistently played guitar riffs with no substance, I'd be very well off.

As for the lyrics, they are GROSS! Allow me to provide an example from their song "All the Days": "All my life, I've been searching for somebody/ Somebody just like you/ All my dreams, I've been dreaming 'bout somebody/ And now they're all coming true". Wasn't that just so original and poetic?

However, every now and again some of the songs seem promising. For instance, the song "Fatman" isn't that terrible. It has decent guitar riffs, but this glimmer of hope is dashed by awful lyrics and mediocre vocals. Mammoth was formed in 1986 when bassist John McCoy met vocalist Nick Moore. Subsequently, they found drummer Tubby Vinnie Reed and guitarist Big Mac Baker. Looking into the band's history, some true talent does exist. McCoy was a somewhat successful session player and Baker received part of his musical training at the Berklee School of Music. Therefore, I've concluded that there was a big rat behind the nastiness of this vinyl offering and he resembles a slimy record executive.

Perhaps the truly revolting thing about this whole deal is the gimmick the record company is using to promote this band. To say that the members of Mammoth are huge in size is an understatement, and the record company is playing on this to grab some attention for the group. It's not so much that they use obesity as a gimmick, it is the way they use it. It lacks taste.

If someone were to do a documentary on Mammoth, I would suggest that he or she title it Spinal Tap, Part II. But I truly doubt anyone will, since this album will go nowhere and Mammoth will follow the path of its namesake and fade into extinction.

MULTICULTURAL AFFAIRS

Professor fights to dispel stereotype

By SARAH DEMASTER
Collegian Staff

Many students picture Native Americans as savage people who hunted, gathered food, and started wars with cowboys.

Bruce Laurie, professor of history at the University of Massachusetts, doesn't see them this way.

Laurie said he tries to "fight the Hollywood image" by teaching his students about the myths surrounding Native Americans.

However, there is some disagreement between professors as to what is myth and what is reality.

Mario DePillis, also a UMass history professor, said he agrees with Laurie that all Native American nations were not alike.

DePillis said "Anyone in race relations knows that to consider all people of one race to be the same culturally, is another kind of racism."

"The Iroquois were very different from the Aztec, the Aztec from the Navaho," he said. "It's very important not to homogenize them."

DePillis said that life in the different nations had tremendous variety as well, with people speaking thousands of unrelated languages.

Laurie said he has trouble making his students see that all Native Americans were not nomadic hunters.

"The Cherokee, for example, were a stable, sedentary, Christian society," he said.

Depillis and Laurie also agree that although many students see them as victims, the Native Americans did not give their land to the American invaders without a fight.

Laurie said, "They weren't helpless victims. They tried, although obviously they failed."

He said he tries to support his claim by presenting students with primary source materials whenever possible.

"The idea is to give some historical agency a voice," he said. "I try not to just talk about the Indians (Native Americans), but present how they feel."

Depillis said many White students have a romanticized view of the plight of the Indians.

"You will find many White students who come into class who have an overcompensated Indian nationalism preached by Caucasians," Depillis said. "It's like Whites that like to speak for Blacks. It seems to be the ultimate put-down by Caucasians."

He added that students today seem to be reviving the 18th century notion of "the noble savage."

"Since the 60s, there has been a widespread adoption of the Indians and the Indian culture as a way to rebel against the main-line culture," he said. "This is part of an ancient White tradition of using certain conceptions of the Indians for their own political or social purposes."

Peter d'Errico, professor of legal studies at UMass, commented on Native American contributions to our society.

"What people take as being American is not thought to have anything to do with what was already here," d'Errico said. "Historical records show that a lot of American popular culture was derived from the American Indians."

He said the United States adopted such traditions as corn, potatoes, chewing gum, basketball, soccer, and lacrosse from the American Indians.

As far as the United States government is concerned, d'Errico said he tells students to look at Benjamin Franklin's writings.

D'Errico said he describes how colonists began to get ideas about forming a union, and implementing concepts only talked about by the Europeans, such as separation of powers.

"The Iroquois were the source of a range of governmental concepts for the colonial leaders," he said.

He added that the United States Senate last year dedicated a memorial to the Iroquois people for their contribution to American government.

Professor DePillis said there is no foundation for the assumption that the Iroquios people made such contributions to the colonialist government.

D'Errico said another myth surrounding Native Americans is that they no longer exist.

He said students who talk about the United States removing land from the Native Americans say, "This is such a horrible thing, but it happened 100 years ago, and there's nothing we can do about it now."

In his course, "The Legalization of the American Indian," d'Errico said he stresses that Native Americans today face the same oppression they did in the past.

He said there are thousands of Native Americans in South and Central America, Guatemala, and El Salvador who are "victims of power groups devised by Anglo-American culture."

These Native Americans are trying to fight industrialization and exploitation of resources in their homelands, he said.

D' Errico added that Native Americans in the United States are not only fighting industrialization, they are fighting to be recognized.

He cited several court cases including the decision 10 years ago by the state of Maine that Native American nations had claims to three-quarters of the state.

"When Indians are recognized, there's always a threat to the state's land property titles," he said. "It sends a shock wave through people when they realize the Indians are not invisible."

Our Perspective

There's something wonderful going on in the Afrikan-American community at UMASS and in the Afrikan-American community at large. In another remarkable testament to the ability of people to be creative and to struggle against the most dire circumstances, a new positive force has arisen even in the face of crack, police brutality and racist attacks, joblessness and despair.

Rudy Krigger

Although there's nothing really new about it, I call it the "New Black Thang", and I'm referring to the resurgence of Afro-centric sentiment among young Afrikan-Americans that is evident everywhere we look. Brothers and sisters know what I'm talking about. Johnson's Hair Care, S Lustre Curl and those people are all crying the blues because we've started throwing away all that chemical foolishnes we used to destroy our hair with, and everywhere I go I'm seeing young sisters and brothers with Afrikan headgear and pendants on.

People sound different too. It wasn't too long ago that I would often have the unpleasant experience of running into teeanagers who didn't know who Malcolm X was. Nowadays you can't even get anyone who will admit to not having read at least his Autobiography. In short, this phenomenon that we are witnessing in the Afrikan-American community is producing a new set of attitudes among young Afrikan-Americans.

The New Black Thang is about being proud and assertive about our Blackness. It's about being down with the People. It's about Afrika and Afrikans. It's about us being us.

Like any cultural renaissance or resurgence of national feeling, this "Thang" that we're talking about has tremendous potential to produce social change because it reflects and contributes to the sharpening of a new consciousness which can act as a powerful stimulus towards political action. The New Black Thang threatens to contribute to breaking the mental chains that have helped to hold Afrikans in bondage.

Indeed, what we are now witnessing is but the first faint rumbles of the a new phase of the Afrikan-American liberation struggle. However, there is a long way to go between the rumblings and the lightning bolt. None of the potential of the New Black Thang can be actualized into reality without hard struggle. All of our pride and awareness will do nothing in and of themselves to further our liberation; only our organized and purposeful action can do that.

The facts of our 400 year existence in the West is that we have gained nothing without struggle and that even that which we have gained must be defended and developed through further effort.

As such, our T-shirts, pendants, and headgear must be more than just empty fashions or projections of an Afrikan-American with an attitude. They must be indications of our love for our people and a willingness to struggle. These are hard times, and we must begin to take seriously the words of the Algerian revolutionary Frantz Fanon, "Every onlooker is either a coward or a traitor." Act. Now.

KKK membership grows

By JONATHAN YENKIN
The Associated Press

BOSTON — The Ku Klux Klan is trying to build membership in New England - the home turf of one of its national leaders - and experts say the White-supremacist group should not be dismissed even though its numbers are small.

"It doesn't take many people to burn crosses or hurt somebody," said Leonard Zeskind, research director for the Center for Democratic Renewal, and Atlanta-based group that monitors White supremacist activity.

The KKK recently made its prescence known in northern New England, setting up a post office box and telephone number in Exeter, NH, for coordinating the group's activities in New Hampshire, Maine and Vermont. supremacy. Callers could ask for information after the message.

In addition, the Klan has distrubuted leaflets in the town, describing the group's goals.

'There's nothing illegal about what they're doing, but I think it's fair to say everyone's upset about the prospect of the Klan being here,' said George Olsen, the Exeter town manager

James Farrands, imperial wizard of the Invisible Empire of the Klan, resides in Shelton, Conn., and he said in a telephone interview last Tuesday that his title shows how the organization is gaining strength "above the Mason Dixon line."

Farrands said the group started recruiting in New Hampshire after people indicated they wanted to join. He declined to say how many members are in his group, but experts say the number is not large.

Activist Dick Gregory shares his views on nutrition in the 80's

By DAVID R. MARK
Collegian Staff

Second of a two-part interview

In the 1960s, Dick Gregory was a comedian. He wanted to make you laugh.

In the 1970s, Dick Gregory was an activist. He wanted to make you change.

In the 1980s, Dick Gregory was a nutritionist. He wanted to make you thin.

Heading into the 1990s, Dick Gregory has assumed the role of drug-buster. Currently on a three-month fast, Gregory, 56, is in Shreveport, La., where he is running the "drug-free-zone capital of the world."

Collegian: What is the best and most effective way to lose weight?

Gregory: First, increase your water intake to a minimum of eight eight-ounce glasses of clean water a day. Second, eat a lot of fruit. Most of us are overweight because our body craves nutrition. When you cook your food, and eat all this fast food, it has no nutrition in it. And a lot of times your brain will make you eat. It has nothing to do with your being hungry.

And the other thing is physical fitness. Walking. Walking every morning.

Collegian: What is the Bahamian diet, which you espouse?

Gregory: It's a mixture of 96 minerals and vegetables, and vitamins, and herbs from vegetables and fruit. It's all natural, no chemicals or additives.

Collegian: What happened to Walter Hudson, the man in Long Island, N.Y. who was too large to go through his front door and then too afraid to leave his home? Did you lose patience with him?

Gregory: I abandoned my program with him. I told him if he ever could get out of his house to call me and I would take him back. But he lost about 700 pounds when I was with him. But I felt to continue to take weight off him in his house, where he did not have proper ventilation in a city that was polluted, would do him a lot of damage. And that wasn't something I wanted to be responsible for.

Collegian: Does it bother you that you're more recognized these days in some circles for your Bahamian diet than for your stands on civil rights issues?

Gregory: No. It's because of Walter Hudson. Because of the fat people. The television cameras run that. It was something that America wanted and the whole world wanted to see. The reason I made big national news is because of Walter Hudson. Look at Bobby Sands, the guy who starved to death in Belfast. He was known the world over because he starved to death. Not because of what else he did.

Collegian: What was your longest hunger strike and what did it accomplish?

Gregory: Two and a half years protesting the war in Vietnam. Since then, in '68 I went on a water fast for 81 days to dramatize where I thought America was headed with the dope problem. I've also fasted for world hunger, the plight in Ethiopia, when the hostages were in Iran — I flew to Iran and prayed over there for four and half months.

Collegian: What were your goals as an independent candidate in the presidential election in 1968, and have any of those goals been achieved in the past 21 years?

Gregory: The first goal was that the greatest right you have in America was the right to vote. A right greater than that was the right not to vote. So I decided I wanted to vote, and give other people the chance to vote for something other than the lesser of two evils. I chose to run as a write-in candidate.

What was accomplished was that a lot of people found out that you don't have to be picked by the downtown boys. You don't have to sit back and be reduced to an insignificant nothing.

Funny folk fiddler flies high at Amherst

Mike Cross
Amherst College
Sunday, Oct. 1

Sunday night the Amherst College Student Center was transformed into a smoke-filled bar atop the hills of western Tennessee. Feet were tapping and hands clapping as self-proclaimed hillbillie, hippie, folk singer Mike Cross entertained with an alternation of six and twelve string acoustic guitar and fiddle. Clad in well worn overalls and singing tales of his growing years in North Carolina, Cross assumed the role of champion story-teller, impersonator and comedian in addition to his versatile musical talent.

In Amherst for a return engagement, Cross's narrative performance style was reminiscent of Arlo Guthrie and "Alice's Restaurant." His fast picking guitar pieces and Southern Appalachian fiddle tunes told of the Carolina country life and its colorful personalities. Whether spinning yarns of moonshine and fishing trips or anecdotes of town drunks, Cross always received a enthusiastic response from the crowd. His character portrayals were so tangible that one could almost smell the breath of "Uncle Josiah," bottle in hand, lying face down on the train tracks confronted with "tallest ladder" he ever had to climb.

REVIEW

The "Great Strip Poker Massacre of 1975" otherwise known as "The Waltz of the Naked Men" recanted the fate of a group of bold junior high boys who talked young Linda into a game of cards for clothes, and lost. Added Cross, "Linda can now be found in Reno - at the blackjack table with all the naked men."

Slowing down the pace, Cross's ability to bring the audience to the places of which he sang was evident in his emotive songs. "The Old Mans Bouquet" left the room silent and teary-eyed, and his cover of "The Band Played Waltzing Matilda" telling of the bloodbath between the Australians and Turks during WWI.

While songs of his life in the South prevailed, Cross's heritage across the ocean in Scotland and Ireland also influenced several pieces. From his fiddle came sounds of Scottish bagpipes and he continued in the Gaelic tradition with an Irish jig.

Cross's adaptability to a wide range of musical formats was highlighted in a closing rock 'n' roll rendition in which Eddie Van Halen and Ginger Baker possessed his body. Equipped with nothing more than flexible vocal chords and a run-away imagination, Cross produced a two minute drum solo and electric guitar encore from his mouth.

With his unique, off-the-wall style of performing and songs that either left you holding your stomach in laughter or brought you to tears, Mike Cross was yet another example that you get more than what you bargain for from the Amherst College folk series.

Art shows limits and limitations

By SCOTT ROSE
Collegian Correspondent

"Field Plug," a three-dimentional work by James Skalman, a young Californian artist, will be exhibited in the University Gallery until Oct. 20. Skalman has undertaken several other constructions around the country emphasising the role of the viewer as a participating component in the appreciation of the sculpture/installation.

The work requires an investment of time upon those wishing to experience it's full effects. Before entering the piece, set aside ten minutes to simply relax and enjoy what you're feeling. The piece is not simply a one dimensional image, but rather a creation that is entered, explored and ultimately experienced.

Upon it's initial impression, one sees an exterior frame which constricts the construction to the right hand side of the gallery. In entering, one sees a raised field or horizon which is dimly lit and whose boundaries, due to limited availiable light, appear to be an unceasing horizon without limit. It is on to this "pastoral" space that the artist has artificially inserted a house structure that the viewer must walk into to see the main exhibit chamber. To do this, the viewer must enter a rather dark room and sit upon a bench.

At this point, do not to become unwarrantedly claustrophobic, simply relax and let your eyes adjust before hastily concluding the significance of the work. The room is dimly lit by an irradescent blue tube on the opposite side from the entrance. If one remains in this seemingly unescapable black box for approximately five minutes, he/she will experience something magical. The light colored ceiling which appears artificially low gives rise to a central rectangle that opens to a limitless sky. Here one's imagination truly takes a grasp of the experience. From all sides, one's vision has been enclosed and limited by light and space only to give rise to the central open ceiling void that appears to exist without limitation. The artist's idea, I feel, was to put a limitless space inside a box inside the limitless night horizon represented by the field all of which is again contained in the outer frame and ultimately within the confines of the walls of the gallery.

To further the experience the artist offers very soft diametrically opposed pieces of music to further enhance the conflicting images of enclosure/space, etheral/primal, heavenly/Earthly in the image of the participant/viewer. He chose Gregorian chants, clearly an homage to the Creator, and the music of Patsy Cline, the gritty, down home Country Westarn singer of the late 50'. The queer juxtaposition of these pieces of the music force the viewer to further question the images of space provided by the walls and the apparent limitless of that space by the employment of the ceiling void.

The Toasters burn up with a slice of ska

By GINA COLETTI
Collegian Correspondent

Toasters
Pearl Street
Saturday, Sept. 30

"Well, do you like 'em?" I said.

"Who doesn't like a ska band?" my friend replied.

This was the first reaction of seeing the Toasters, a six-piece ska band from New York City, who played Saturday night at Pearl Street. But the Toasters (produced by Joe Jackson) have been trying to, and succeeding at, being more than just another ska band.

REVIEW

Ska is simply an up-tempo precursor to reggae. It is a form of music that always has a wave of bands at once. According to bassist Greg Grinnell, a former UMass student, this works for the band in terms of promotion, and against them in that record companies don't give them serious, singular consideration.

But in light of their performance last night, consideration is just what this band deserves. Started in 1984 by American Steve Hex (keyboardist) and Englishman Rob Hingley (guitarist), the band has gone through many reformations over the past 5 years. Hex and Hingley are the only two original members left. The newest member is vocalist and toaster (dub-style rap) Coolie Ranks, who dedicated every song to "the ladies in the audience," and was basically responsible for making a rather stiff 21-and-over crowd loosen up. Ska is meant to be danced to, and once people figured out how to dance faster than they would to reggae and actually pick up their feet, the crowd got going.

The highlights of the 90-minute show were the songs "Run Rudy Run," "One Track Mind," and the heart-stopping pace of "East Side Beat" (the group is from the East Village in New York.). Perhaps the only low point was "Don't Touch the Crack," a nice sentiment, but an overplayed theme lately, in the hip-hop and reggae world. The band encored with three songs, the last being a respectable cover of James Brown's "Night Train."

In an era of superband reunions, it is difficult for younger bands to get the record contracts, or the money needed to produce videos to establish in the music business. This is unfortunate, because based on their performance on Saturday night, the Toasters are a band with a lot to offer.

jor John Nelson are, in their own words, "power electronic users." Their room in Sylvan contains more electronics than Radio Shack. Between them, they own a powerful surround stereo system hooked up to four speakers, two CD players, a color television with a VCR and a mindboggling amount of CDs, videotapes and cassettes.

"I like to think that in the case of school being cancelled, we are fully stocked with distractions," Bradway said.

"We have between 1500 and 200 watts of distractions here," added Nelson.

Bradway and Nelson admit however, that they are victims of the success of outfitting their room. "People are always coming in here to visit because of all the stuff we have. Anyway, with all this stuff, if I really have to study, I go elsewhere. There is no way I can read Shakespeare here," Nelson said.

If Bradway and Nelson's room is power electronics, then Phil Smith and Mike Baron's room, just two doors down in the same suite, is power comfort. Their room, arranged in cozy living room style, contains a full length couch, a matching rug and a footlocker that doubles as a coffee table. Smith thanks his dog for the comfortable surroundings.

"We got the couch because my dog ate part of it and my mom couldn't stand looking at it," he said. "Then he ate part of the rug, so we got that, too."

Baron said the comfort made studying easier. "It's a perfect place to study," he said. "I've never studied as much in college or in high school than in this room because it is so comfortable to do work in."

"We can also have friends over comfortably because there are places to sit," Smith said. "Usually when you visit someone you have to sit on their bed, here you can sit on the couch."

James Glover, a sophomore pre-communications major, changed his room in Baker to look like the guts of the Video House. His room is peppered with movie posters and pin-ups in the effort to decrease the amount of cold cement that surrounds it. "I hate bare walls,"said Glover. " Every wall has to be covered."

Fashion prevails in junior Christine Lee's room much like Mallory Keaton's room on Family Ties. Dozens of ads and spreads from magazines like Vogue and Elle flank her room in Crampton, and make it appear more crowded than it is. A bright carpet and colorful sheets add to the room that she finds peaceful enough to do all of her studying at.

David Capozzi, a sophomore theater major, believes that the key to in his Orchard Hill room is, "a rug and two pillows on every bed," but most importantly finding comfort in your room is "sort of an attitude."

Capozzi realizes that, "This is your home now. You do what you do at your house. It's not a motel." Keeping this in mind Capozzi has torn off the traditional Orchard Hill desks and brought in 'real furniture'.

Most of Capozzi's work is done on his floor lounge. He considers his room to only be his living area. The paraphernalia that makes this living area is considered to be both his and his roommate's. "It is too complicated and too stupid to be drawing lines."

Water polo takes 3 of 4

By JOHN STEVEN MARPLE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts water polo team swam away with victories in three out of four games this past weekend to even its record off at 5-5. UMass defeated Penn State 12-5, Queens College 19-12 and St. Francis 18-4. The lone defeat came at the hands of Iona on Sunday by a 9-6 score.

Against Penn State the Minutemen sprinted to a quick 5-0 lead in the first quarter and stretched it to 8-1 at the midway point. Scoring for UMass were Jon Miller, three goals, Scott Deluca, two goals, and Steve Jungbluth, two goals. Chipping in one goal each were Craig Siegel, Brian McIver, Scott Reed, J.P. Kennedy and Tom Quinn.

UMass made the most of its man-up situations, scoring on all three of its opportunities. Defensively, Todd Larson (seven saves) and Pete Koback (three saves) split the game in net.

UMass found a high octane offense in its next two games, outscoring Queens and St. Francis by a 37-16 margin. Against Queens the Minutemen used the second and fourth quarters to pull away the victory. They outscored Queens 8-5 in the second, and 5-1 in the decisive final stanza to create a 19-12 final.

McIver led the offense with a half dozen goals, followed by Miller with five goals and two assists. Alex Yelensky (four goals, three assists) also had a productive day for the Minutemen. Deluca, Siegal, Reed, G.T. Ladd and Adam Feldman each contributed one goal to the cause. In the net, Carl Johnson picked up five saves while sharing time with Larson (three saves).

Against St. Francis the game was over for all intent and purpose at the end of the opening quarter, maybe even sooner than that. UMass dominated the water in that quarter jumping out to a 7-0 lead. The score at each quarter thereafter found UMass ahead 11-1, 15-2 and 18-4.

Nabbing goals were Jay Peluso, Felipe Gonzalez, Mike Melanson, Bill Pendergast, J.P. Kennedy, Reed, Quinn, Feldman, Jungbluth, Koback and Johnson.

"We shouldn't lose to teams like Penn State, Queens and St. Francis," said coach Russ Yarworth. "These type of games give us a chance to get some new kids playing."

On Sunday, UMass played Iona for the second time this year. The Minutemen were victorious the first time around (9-8, Sept. 17) but took it on the chin this time, losing 9-6.

"Our defense and sense of team play went out the window in this game," said Yarworth.

Poor conversion of man-up situations continually hurt the Minutemen. On the afternoon they converted a wimpy two out of nine chances. "We can't afford to do that against a team like Iona," said Yarworth.

"McIver led UMass offensively with three goals. He was supported by Miller, Feldman and Reed, all of whom scored one goal each. Johnson was in net for this game, stopping seven out of the 16 shots he faced.

UMass plays at Amherst College tomorrow night.

Minutewomen to host UConn

By C.J. ABATI
Collegian Staff

After an impressive 7-2 victory over Fairfield College last week, the women's tennis team (2-2) hopes to keep the momentum rolling this afternoon when it faces the University of Connecticut. The match will take place at the Upper Boyden courts at 3 p.m.

UConn and UMass played twice last year with the Huskies, winning both matches by rather large margins. "They're a very good team," said coach Edwin Gentzler. "They've beaten us fairly easily in the past. They usually finish third or fourth in the Big East." Connecticut is favored to win again this year.

The Minutewomen have been on a roll recently, winning their last two matches. Connecticut will definitely be a tough test for them. Despite the fact that he has the weaker team, Gentzler remains optimistic.

"I'm looking forward to playing them," Gentzler said. "We're pretty close to catching up to teams like Connecticut and Providence." Gentzler is referring to the team's earlier loss to the Friars.

"They are where our program should be," Gentzler said. "Whether we get there this year or next, I don't know. We will get there."

"We've had some good momentum over the last week or so," Gentzler said. "I'd like to keep it going. We need a good performance from everybody. We also need some consistency in the top six spots."

no harm done, except that Karelas could have been in consideration for Defensive Player-of-the-Week honors if it had been done right originally.

Update from the local M*A*S*H unit: This category gets more depressing every week. Among the banged and bruised from Saturday are Karelas and nose guard Joe Cullen.

Cullen, who came into the game with a bad ankle, played only six plays before having to leave.

"When you lose a player of that caliber, you're in trouble," BU coach Chris Palmer said. "We had his number all week."

Cullen's status is listed as day-to-day for Rhody. Karelas should be ready to go Saturday.

Around the Yan Con: New Hampshire finally got on the winning track with a mild upset of Delaware, 27-17. Connecticut came from behind to knock off Yale, 31-20. Rhode Island dumped Brown, 18-13 and Maine pounded Richmond, 41-16, which led to the winner of this next category . . .

Quote of the Week: Uttered by Richmond coach Jim Marshall, as his Spiders fell behind 35-0 before halftime: "I hope the engines are running on the plane, so we can get the hell out of here fast."

"This tournament enabled our younger kids to gain the experience they need," said Roberts.

"The teams we faced this weekend are better and more intense than opponents in our league," said Kline. "This was a well-run program."

"The weather was a great plus for the tournament," said UMass head coach Jeff Gettler of the Cup weekend. "We were pleased with the turnout . . . the play . . . the results."

Smith leads the front pack for UMass harriers

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Correspondent

The dream of every team captain is to compete and help lead their team in grand style. Some have the opportunity to accomplish their dream, and women's cross country captain Shana Smith seems to be doing just that. The senior sociology major from Acton, MA has been the catalyst in the Minutewomen's impressive start.

Although the team's record is 1-1-1, they've only lost to Yale, a national contender. Smith was UMass' top runner in a 54-54 tie with Boston College, finishing behind only one Eagle runner. On Sept. 23, Smith won by 30 seconds in a 19-38 win over Springfield College.

The race against Springfield was indicative of the kind of competitor that Smith is, according to coach Julie LaFreniere. "Shana could have let up at the end with such a big lead, but she kept running hard to prepare for bigger meets later on."

In indoor track, Smith finished fourth in New England in the 1000-meters as a freshman. Outdoors, Smith won the New England Championships in the 800-meters.

Smith's first season running cross country, her sophomore year at UMass, tells volumes about her. "She was a little bit tentative in her first couple of races, adjusting to the longer distances of cross-country," said LaFreniere.

The hesitation period didn't last too long: all of two meets. "In her third meet, the Holy Cross invitational, Shana just went out and ran with some of the top runners in New England (Smith finished fifth out of 89 runners). From then on, she was our top runner," said LaFreniere. Smith earned her first MVP award for cross-country that season.

After taking winter and spring season off to concentrate on academics, Smith picked up right where she left off during the fall of her junior year. She and freshman Precious Hill helped lead the team to an impressive 6-2 record, and she earned her second MVP award.

Speaking to Smith reveals her extreme modesty and sincere committment to team goals. When asked about goals for this season's cross country team, Smith says, "I hope that we can finish third in New England. We need to work to get our top five or six runners coming in at the end of the race together."

As for her role as team captain, Smith is similarly humble. "I don't try to do anything differently. It's not like I'm the leader and everyone else follows — we just all work together to fix problems," Smith said.

When Smith is asked about her favorite of the three running seasons, she chooses cross country. "It's the most fun of the three seasons. You work hard to get the whole team running together," Smith said, typically stressing the importance of team goals.

Right now, her favorite race in track is the 1500-meters. "As I get older, I think I'm starting to lose my speed in the 800, so the 1500 is a better pace for me," Smith said.

Despite her "age", it hardly seems time for Smith to hang up her spikes, at least not for the rest of the season.

Smith does have one season of eligibility left if she chooses to attend graduate school at UMass. "I'm not really sure about next year — maybe graduate school. I'd certainly consider going here if I do attend grad school next year."

In the Massachusetts Challenge Cup tournament held over the weekend at Boyden Field, Boston University defeated Delaware on Saturday, 3-0. On Sunday, George Washington clinched the tourney by beating BU, 2-0.

"Despite the looks of the score, we held the ball too much," said Boston head coach Neil Roberts of Saturday's game. "We were able to clear things up in the second half.

"We did what we wanted to do," said Roberts. "We have to be happy with that. We haven't been as intense as we can be."

"This tournament was an opportunity to play against a different region, a different style of play. It's been a learning experience," Delaware coach Loren Kline said.

"Their (George Washington) counterattack worked very well." said Roberts. "We failed to play the midfield the way we could."

"Our patience payed off," said GW coach George Lidster. "It was important to not allow a goal in the first half. We were able to build from there."

Immediately following the Minutemen's victory over Delaware on Sunday, awards were presented to the respective teams and players. George Washington placed first in the Tournament; UMass placed second; Boston placed third; and Delaware in the basement of the four team tourney.

Reid gets no kick out of BU setback

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

Suffice to say that University of Massachusetts football coach Jim Reid hasn't gotten a kick out of his punting game the last couple of weeks.

Against the University of Maine, two blocked punts led directly to Black Bear touchdowns. Reid said that punter Marco Gabrielli had been hampered when the kicking net fell over on his leg in pregame warm-ups.

Then Saturday against Boston University at Nickerson Field, the wind was gone, but the results were the same. Two more blocked punts and several others below par.

Sometimes in this game of running, passing, blocking and tackling, the special teams play is overlooked (after all, this game is called *foot*ball, isn't it?). But Reid says this isn't the case with the Minutemen.

"If we work any more on the punting game, we won't have any more time to practice," Reid said. "Our kickoff return team is excellent, our kick coverage is excellent. Our punt return team does a nice job, but our punting team has been pretty lousy."

Which is a surprise, in a way. Gabrielli, a junior, is in his first year punting, taking over for graduated Dimitri Yavis after handling mostly kickoffs last year. But in his first two games he fared well, banging a 72-yarder (called back by penalty) and a 58-yarder against James Madison. So, what's wrong?

"The snaps (from center) are adequate, but his steps are too long, too time-consuming," Reid said.

But it may not be just Gabrielli's doing. Fullback David Mitchell, the backup punter, took the last two kicks Saturday and got off an average 30-yarder before badly shanking a seven-yard job that almost wents sideways out of bounds.

When things like that are happening, it means only one thing. The defense is barreling in on the kicker much faster than they should, which equals a poor job blocking on the line.

The offensive line (like the rest of the team) has been hurting of late, which could be a big contributing factor.

The Return of the Quarterback Controversy: Sophomore Gary Wilkos made his first collegiate appearance in the fourth quarter Saturday, fueling speculation that there may be a change behind center for this weekend's Homecoming meeting against Rhode Island.

Wilkos was in the running in preseason before fifth-year senior Roger Baldacci established himself with a pair of good games. But with the offense staggering of late, there is always the possibility of a shake-up.

"Right now I don't know," Reid said when asked about a possible switch. "It would be easy to say right now we're going to make a switch. But you've got to keep your frustration level at a manageable point."

What Reid is saying is that opinions after a tough loss like Saturday's can be changed when the game films are dissected, or after a week of practice. But he has confidence in Wilkos if that's what the decision comes down to.

"I like that kid. He's a competitive son of a gun and he has a nice arm," Reid said.

Really, is addition that difficult?: For the second time in three weeks, a UMass player was almost short-changed in the final NCAA statistics by an opposing stats crew.

At Lehigh it was Baldacci who was given five more passing attempts than he should have, which only made a dramatic difference in his standing among the nation's passers.

Saturday at BU, linebacker George Karelas' final tackle line was three unassisted and four assisted, for seven total. Further checking found that he actually had 17. Again,

Minutewomen win one out of two games

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts field hockey team found out full well over the weekend that you can fool some of the people some of the time. But you can't fool all of the people all of the time.

The Minutewomen rolled over a St. Joseph's team that it could probably have almost beaten with its eyes closed, 5-0 on Saturday but came up short on Sunday when they took on Atlantic 10 rival Penn State, starting the eight-hour journey home from University Park, Pa. with a 1-0 loss to the Nittany Lions.

UMass had no problems in the first half on Sunday. Phillipa Scott, who was brilliant in net, turned each Penn State shot away and the Minutewomen went into halftime with a scoreless game.

But the second half was when the roof caved in.

"In the second we just got a little unsettled," UMass coach Pam Hixon said. "We just didn't get in sync after halftime. They (the Nittany Lions) kind of turned it up a notch."

That stepped up intensity by Penn State allowed the Nittany Lions to draw a penalty corner about 10 minutes into the second half which Eleanor Stone capitalized on. Stone picked up a rebound in a crowd in front of the UMass net and knocked it home to give Penn State the lead for good.

Scott had a very busy afternoon as compared to Saturday when she had to make just four saves. The freshman goalie from England saved 19 Penn shots before UMass bowed for the third time this year.

"Scotty really was fantastic," Hixon said.

Scott and the rest of the team was fantastic on Saturday as well.

The Minutewomen, 6-3, went into the weekend knowing that a split was a must and Saturday's game figured to be the easier of the two as St. Joes was not ranked in the top 20. Both were Atlantic 10 games, which is why UMass had to have at least one of the them.

UMass accomplished that goal on Saturday, showing signs of the team that won the Atlantic 10 championship last year. Sunday would have been icing on the cake.

"I had seen them (Penn State) on tape," Hixon said. And they had been scoring a lot of goals so I knew it was going to be a dogfight."

UMass scratched and bit for most of the game but at the end, was left panting.

"We need to put two halves together," Hixon said. "We've been a 35 or 45 minute team (out of 70 minutes)"

Maybe UMass needs to play like they did on Saturday when the Minutewomen totally overwhelmed the Hawks.

Seniors Kathy DeAngelis and Mara Fratassio each had a goal along with sophomores Kerri Fagan and Dawn Trumbauer and freshman Kathy Phelan as Scott picked up a shutout.

The loss on Saturday dropped UMass to 2-1 in the A-10. The Minutewomen had beaten Rutgers the week before up at Totman Field. Penn State ran its record to 2-0 in the A-10.

The Minutewomen have not seen the last of their Atlantic 10 opponents either. Temple University comes to Amherst on Saturday for what will be a big game for both teams. Temple was ranked No. 8 in the latest NCAA poll with UMass twelfth.

Pro-choice activists hold candlelight vigil

By KATERI WALSH
Collegian Staff

More than 100 people gathered at the campus pond last night to mourn the death of Rosie Jimenez, a 27-year old Chicana woman who died 12 years ago of an infection incurred during a "back alley" abortion.

"Though the infection was a result of the abortion, the real reason [Rosie] died was because she was poor," said Carole Ann Camp, a reverend doctor for the United Church of Christ, who last night delivered a eulogy at the candlelight vigil.

Jimenez was the first woman known to have died from an abortion after the passage of the Hyde Amendment in 1976 made federal funding of abortions illegal, according to Marci Lew of the pro-choice organization People for Choice, sponsors of the vigil.

Camp began her eulogy saying, "We are grieving, great mother, for our sisters have been taken from us. And we fear that more women will die as Rosaura Jimenez did."

Camp continued that Jimenez "was confronted with as difficult a choice as are all women who have to choose whether to have an abortion or not."

She added that Jimenez' choice was even more difficult because she had to decide whether to use her money for education or a medically-safe abortion. Jimenez, who was six months shy of a Bachelor of Arts degree in Education at the time of her death, chose to have a "back alley" abortion and complete her education, Camp said.

At the end of her eulogy, Camp lit a candle on a mock grave, saying, "The candle that I will light is for Rosie to remind us all of her death and the constant struggle of her life in poverty."

One by one, 50 people, symbolizing the deaths of women in all 50 states, approached "Rosie's candle" and lit separate candles from it as they named each state.

Freshman journalism major Linda Petrillo held a candle representing North Dakota. "When I heard about [Rosie's death] and situations like it, it really upset me because no one should have to die because of a decision like this."

Cui Li-Ying, a part-time 55-year-old University of Massachusetts student, said, "I am from China, and I was amazed when I learned that some people think that abortion is killing here and want it to be made illegal."

Cui, who is taking classes while her husband works as a visiting professor in the biochemistry department, added, "It could only happen here. It will never happen in China."

Alan Ditmore, a junior civil engineering major and a member of People for Choice, said, "It's important for me to show solidarity with this movement and to memorialize the death of Rosie Jimenez because I don't want to see my friends' rights or my sisters' rights taken from them."

"I think it's anti-human insanity to raise barriers to abortion and I don't see how it helps anyone," Ditmore added.

When all the candles had been lit, the circle of people observed a moment of silence and then sang a song written for Jimenez by Lew.

One by one, all those holding candles placed a flower on the mock grave, blew out their candle, and then walked away as Camp said, "Take the light from the candles and go forth into a world where apathy continues to thrive, and let your life move the world a little closer to love."

REMEMBERING — Students gather at the campus pond last night to hold a candlelight vigil in support of abortion rights.

60 elected to Undergraduate Student Senate

By NATHAN KRYSTALL
Collegian Staff

Sixty students were elected to the Undergraduate Student Senate yesterday in repeat elections of the Commuter, Southwest South, Southwest North and Greek areas.

In contrast to last week's elections, which were rerun due to procedural errors, yesterday's elections were relatively free of complaints, according to Ross Condit, who coordinated the elections.

"Everything went really smoothly," Condit said.

Condit said voter turnout for the Commuter and Southwest areas was heavier than at last week's elections. The Greek area experienced a low turnout in both elections.

Nobody ran or voted for the Prince or Hamlin areas so those area senators will be elected by their house councils, Condit said.

He said the Commuter Area election was marred because a ballot was stolen from the voting table. He said the ballot was photocopied and then used by the Progressive Coalition as campaign flyers.

Election officials said the elections are likely to be ratified at tomorrow night's senate meeting, despite the stolen ballot.

Condit said the Commuter Area elections have historically been the most controversial senate elections.

These are the winners according to last night's tallies:

Noriega thwarts attempted coup

By RAFAEL CANDANEDO
The Associated Press

PANAMA CITY, Pananma — Troops loyal to Gen. Manuel Antonio Noriega recaptured the headquarters of the Panamanian Defense Forces yesterday and declared that they had crushed an attempted coup.

Rebellious troopers seized the headquarters compound in the morning and apparently failed to capture Noriega, and loyal forces counterattacked. After a six-hour gunbattle, the government claimed victory.

"We want to underline that the situation in the country has been duly controlled to guarantee the peace and tranquility that the state should assure for its citizens," said a statement released by Justice and Interior Minister Olmedo Miranda.

The United States has been trying to oust Noriega, the Defense Forces chief who controlls the government, for nearly two years. However, officials in Washington said they were not responsible for the attempted coup and U.S. troops were not involved.

The Justice Department statement declared an 8 p.m.-to-5 a.m. curfew and said the news media could report only official statements on the revolt.

UMass deans to meet in Boston to discuss impact of budget cuts

Additional five percent cut likely

Deans of colleges from all three University of Massachusetts campuses will meet in Boston today at the office of President David Knapp for a press conference to discuss the impact of budget cutbacks.

Joseph Cusker, spokesman for the president's office, said a press conference is scheduled for 8:30 a.m. at the office.

"We want to get a more detailed account of what the budget situation means for their college," he said of the deans' visit.

All three campuses have experienced five budget revisions over the last three years. He said the possibility of a sixth cutback due to low state revenues increases the necessity of the conference.

L. Edward Lashman, state secretary of Administration and Finance, issued a memo recently stating that an additional five percent budget cutback to all state agencies is likelv in the future.

"I don't have a clue as to how we're going to deal with that," Cusker said.

Award-winning poet delivers challenge

By SARAH DEMASTER
Collegian Staff

In a performance several students described as powerful, author Ntozake Shange last night challenged a group of more than 150 students in the Student Union Ballroom to think about what it means to be Black.

Twirling her hair slowly around her finger and whispering at certain times and raising her voice in a shrill scream at other times, Ntozake drew applause and shouts of approval as she read from several of her works.

In the poem, "It Hasn't Always Been This Way," dedicated to jazz musician Duke Ellington and Black activist W.E.B. DuBois among others, Ntozake discusses growing up in a Black neighborhood.

"It was not called a ghetto," she said. "You heard the words 'under-classed,' 'underprivileged,' 'deprived' — I never felt any of these things."

"We [Blacks] are not suffering from the lack of anything, but to be treated as human beings," she said.

Ntozake next introduced the audience to the character "Crack Annie" in a poem which discussed the drug problem facing many Blacks today.

"Something's happening that's never happened before," she said. "For the first time in the history of Black people in North America, mothers are abandoning their children for crack."

Using infomation she collected from documented cases in New York, Texas, and California, Ntozake detailed the problems of both drug abusers and the victims of their abuse.

Ntozake, named intially Paulette Williams, was born in North Carolina and first achieved success with the performance of her play, "For Colored Girls Who Have Considered Suicide/When the Rainbow is Enuf," which became an Obie Award-winner and a best-selling book.

Ntozake is currently working on a novel "Rich Little Colored Boys," and a videotape of her band Syllable, which she has been with for over a year.

Ntozake said she gets the most enjoyment out of composing songs and poems with the band.

"When we change the words, that's exciting," she said.

Activists visit striking miners; UMass students donate supplies

A University of Massachusetts student, who joined about 65 other East Coast students at the Solidarity Caravan to aid striking miners in southwestern Virginia last weekend, said workers are frustrated but determined in their efforts to secure a contract.

Janice Kissinger, a member of the Organization for Marxist Studies, and UMass students Jonathan Leavitt and Binky Feldman, visited two coal plants with about 20 miners and their families during the trip.

Kissinger blasted the Pittston Coal Mining Company for failing to provide a contract for some 1,500 members of the United Mine Workers of America. The miners worked for one year without a contract before waging a strike on April 5.

Kissinger said the company is now using non-union employees and producing one-third of their usual output of coal.

"The scabs are probably getting more than the rate [$125 per day]," she said. "If the miners lose they will be forced to work for lower wages and zero security."

Kissinger said the miners, some who have been working since their early teens, are fighting to protect safety regulations and benefits for future generations.

The strikers are living on union benefits and donations. The UMass group donated three boxes of canned food, a box of clothes and $100 to benefit the miners, she said.

Anti-violence rally tonight

NOW urges women to 'Take Back the Night'

By DANIELLE BIONDA
Collegian Staff

The UMass chapter of the National Organization for Women will protest violence against women as members tonight rally and march during "Take Back the Night."

"Specifically at this time, it's a matter of safety," said UMass NOW co-president Gina Gombar, adding that budget cuts affecting the UMass escort service and the need for awareness have made the event necessary.

The escort service, which has recently received a donation of $1,000, has had debilitating service cuts this semester.

"The march is not only a reinstatement of the protest of violence against women, but it's also trying to empower women," Gombar said.

Men and women are welcome to join the rally, but the march will be exclusive to women, she said.

Carla Halpern, NOW co-president, siad, "The purpose of women walking alone after the rally is symbolic of the day when women can walk alone without the fear of violence and rape."

The protesters were met with some resistance last year, Gombar said. Yet despite the negative reaction protesters received from a few community members last year, the protesters will march around the campus after the rally, and meet afterward at the Student Union Building.

The rally will be begin at 6 p.m. on the steps of the SUB where protesters will share poetry, songs, and their personal experiences, Gombar said.

Progressives dominate elections

By NATHAN KRYSTALL
Collegian Staff

The Progressive Coalition continued to make waves in the Undergraduate Student Senate yesterday by dominating the Commuter Area elections for the second time in two weeks.

Thirty-one coalition members were elected to the Undergraduate Student Senate; 32 Commuter Area positions were open for election.

Chambers said the coalition has two immediate goals — to get elected and to sway the election of the senate nominating subcommittee, which appoints senators to serve on various committees.

However, the coalition appeared to have suffered a schism after Liz Hart was dropped from the coalition prior to yesterday's election. Hart was the only non-coalition member elected yesterday.

Hart said she was dropped after she voted against ratifying last week's elections. Most coalition members were in favor of ratification.

"How progressive can the ticket be if it's not supporting the only liberal, disabled woman running for the senate," Hart said.

Coalition member Clarinda Rose-Turner said, "I question a coalition that ostracizes someone who doesn't do what they say."

Rose-Turner said she was unhappy because coalition members have concentrated more on the election than on the issues on their agenda.

The coalition's agenda, according to their campaign flyer, includes tenants' rights, women's choice, housing, child care and quality affordable education.

But Chambers said the coalition is "purely political."

Protesters to host workshop

Protesters who staged a sit-in at the Collegian for more than five hours last week returned yesterday to propose a racism workshop for the paper's staff.

Editor in Chief David R. Mark and Managing Editor Cosmo Macero Jr. agreed to the workshop, which will be run today by the more than 20 students who are calling the paper racist.

"We're trying to work with them," Mark said. "If they want to work things out, we will get things accomplished. But if they only continue to demand things, things will stay stagnant."

The students, who are not part of an official group, quietly distributed photocopies of articles and cartoons that have appeared in the Collegian over the past 2½ years.

"The editors are giving us their ears and once they go over the material, maybe they will realize the mistakes they have made," said one of the protestors, senior Eyad Kishawi.

The articles will be presented tomorrow at the meeting to support the students' three demands: Mark's resignation, the reestablishment of the Black Affairs page, and the introduction of a page for Third World students. Mark maintains he will not resign, and was unsure whether the other demands would be met.

The students were at first locked out, but one student climbed through the classified advertising window to unlock the door.

Director of Public Safety Arthur Hilson and Assistant Dean of Students Edward Korza observed the discussions.

Reverend discusses sex, friendship

By DARCY KOCHISS
Collegian Correspondent

The people who are the best sexual lovers are those who learn the art of friendship with others as well as with themselves, said the Rev. Richard Rohr last night during a lecture at the Newman Center.

Rohr, of the Center For Action and Contemplation in New Mexico, spoke about "Sexuality and Spirituality" to more than 100 people in the center's chapel.

Rohr said men have a harder time making friendship a priority in a relationship because of elements in society which discourage some forms of affection.

In our society, he said, men cannot walk down the street "holding hands or arm in arm" without being shunned.

"Men are victims of the patriarchial system," he said. "Women have kept the sexual experience in higher regard."

In society, women are more free to express feelings of affection, he said, joking, "Men do not know what to do between meeting a woman and getting into bed."

Rohr said people must be able to "like" themselves before they attempt to forge friendships with others.

"We cannot depend on others for our happiness," he said. "We must find it in ourselves first."

Rohr told the audience to love, respect, and honor their own bodies and to "never hate them."

Sexual relations between individuals must be seen as symbols instead of simple acts, he said. The act must emphasize the meaning of the symbols to be successful, he added.

"Undoubtedly, you will make mistakes in communicating to others with your body," he said. "But be honest with yourself. No one is an expert on anything."

He explained two rules for "chastity," meaning pure intentions not abstinence. The first rule is to "break no rules, even at the loss of some."

The second focused on the importance of "spiritual richness."

"Increase richness, even at the cost of some mistakes," he said.

Too often, "free love," or casual sex, has destroyed the relationships of many "would-be lovers" because friendship was not a component, he said.

"Free love destroyed and ruined a lot of loves when it wasn't truthful — when you only show somebody part of yourself," he said.

The act of sex, he said, must be the equal giving and receiving by two people. If that is not there, the act is not real, he said.

Rohr said the best teachers that people have, in reard to love, are their "real friends" that stand by through difficult times.

Rohr also said that "good sex" occurs when the people are not "divided" — or when a person can show his or her partner all of himself, "not just part."

"There are two kind's of coalitions," Chambers said. "One, to get elected, and two, to work on issues. This one's to get elected."

Chambers said it is possible that another coalition will be formed to work on specific student issues.

He said the coalition was formed by reaching out to different groups on campus, including People for a Socially Responsible University.

In both yesterday's and last week's elections, which were nullified by the senate due to procedural errors, the coalition widely distributed "Vote Progressive" campaign flyers, which proved to be a simple but effective campaign strategy.

The flyers were produced by photocopying last week's Commuter Area ballot, but erasing the names of candidates who were not coalition members.

Voters who were handed the flyers on their way to the ballot box could vote for the coalition by checking off the names of coalition members on the flyers that corresponded to those on the ballots.

"We made a few thousand copies [of the flyers]," Chambers said.

Eating discussed

By TINA NICODEMUS
Collegian Correspondent

Women need to accept their bodies the way they are and recognize the symptoms and consequences of eating disorders, said Leslea Newman in a lecture Monday at Mount Holyoke College.

In the lecture, titled, "What are you eating — What's eating you?," Newman discussed the importance of self-acceptance and partially blamed society for women's obsession with weight.

"We are taught to be tall, blonde, thin, blue-eyed, heterosexual, and above all, thin," Newman said.

She said this perspective is often damaging, causing such obsessive eating disorders as anorexia nervosa, self-inflicted starvation, and bulimia, which is binging on food and then purging.

"You are perfect just because you exist," Newman said. "We have a body type that we are all born with. There's not much we can do about the type of body we have."

Newman, a recovered anorexic and bulimic, discussed the causes, symptoms, and consequences of the disorders.

Included in the many causes of both disorders are self-hate, reluctance to face adulthood, moving away from home, and an inclination towards obsessive behavior, she said.

Persons with eating disorders often experience such symptoms as mood swings, pre-occupation with weight and food, obsession with personal appearance, and low self-esteem, she said.

There are many severe consequences of anorexia and bulimia, including severe weight loss, loss of menstruation, lowered metabolism, tooth loss, tearing of the esophagus, throat cancer, and death.

Newman stressed that although, in this society "there's a lot of shame around having an eating disease," it is important to seek help.

Black, Hispanic, Cape Verdean drop-out rate higher than others

Administration works to retain them

By SHARON WILKEY
Collegian Staff

When Tracy Davis first came to the University of Massachusetts three years ago, she said other students made her feel like a China Doll.

"My roommate was not a racist, but she was insensitive and kept asking me questions like 'Do you tan in the summer?'" Davis said yesterday.

No other Black students lived on her residence hall floor, she said. Davis, now a senior and president of the Student Government Association, said she has persevered through the pressures faced by other Black and minority students at UMass.

Others have not been as successful.

Minority student enrollment at UMass has increased each year since 1986, but the most recent statistics available suggest the majority of Blacks, Hispanics, and Cape Verdeans are dropping out before graduation.

Only 28 percent of freshmen from these minority groups who entered the University for the first time in the fall of 1982 and 1983 graduated within 10 semesters, according to a report by the Office of Institutional Research and Planning that will be published this fall.

Nearly twice as many — 57 percent — of Whites, Asians, and Native Americans from the same classes graduated during that period.

"Students of color have a lot more problems to worry about at the beginning of the semester," Davis said. "You have to worry about whether your roommate may be a racist or a bigot, how professors will react to you — when you are the only Black in a class of 200 Whites, then they know when you aren't there — and you have to worry about being judged on your performance."

Of the Blacks, Hispanics, and Cape Verdeans who did not graduate, 32 percent were dismissed for academic deficiency, 30 percent withdrew for unspecified reasons, and eight percent were still enrolled.

Davis said, "If you're not on the ball and able to handle the pressure in the first two weeks, then the rest of the semester is shot."

Racial incidents on campus, like the New Africa House occupation last year, negatively affected her grades, she said.

National studies have shown that at least three factors affect the student dropout rate: academic achievement, financial support, and feelings of isolation and alienation characteristic of minority students at predominantly white institutions.

Dean of Academic Support Services Ann Quinley said in an interview last week that the University is focusing on the three areas in hopes of increasing minority student retention.

"We're moving on all fronts," she said.

Ann Quinley, dean of academic support services at UMass, is involved with a new program aimed at retaining minority students.

"I think there are a tremendous amount of different things going on and there is a reason for optimism."

Two University programs, the Committee for Collegiate Education of Blacks and other Minority Students, and the Bilingual Collegiate Program, offer academic counseling, tutorials, and workshops.

At a time when state budget constraints have strangled other University programs and departments, Quinley said, "We cut CCEBMS and BCP less than we cut anything else, and we certainly are intending to continue that."

More than 550 students are enrolled in CCEBMS, and nearly 600 are enrolled in the BCP. Most CCEBMS students are Black and most BCP students are Hispanic, but both groups are racially mixed.

The majority of students in each program are in good academic standing and some receive personal as well as academic counseling, the directors said.

Funding provided spaces for 21 additional students to enter the BCP's Mainstream program this fall, said BCP director Benjamin Rodriguez. Students in the Mainstream program spend their first year following a preparatory curriculum designed to improve their English, and plan to graduate after five years.

Irma McClaurin-Allen, interim director of CCEBMS, said the OIRP statistics may exaggerate the actual number of minority drop outs by only presenting a "snapshot" of a fluctuating situation.

McClaurin-Allen added, "Even if the retention rate were 50 percent, we should still be concerned."

This fall CCEBMS has started "intrusive counseling," that requires more than 60 new students to attend mandatory study halls and bi-monthly meetings with advisors, as well as creating academic contracts. The more stringent regulations will allow advisors to monitor students' progress more closely, Allen said.

Funding was not available for individual tutoring this year, and Allen said she is concerned group tutorial sessions for upper-level classes may not be as effective. Quinley said she expects funding for individual sessions to be restored next year.

In addition, Quinley has started a mentoring program in hopes of enhancing contact between students of color and faculty, thereby minimizing isolation and providing support for potential academic difficulties.

This fall 54 freshmen have been paired with faculty sponsors who will meet with them one-on-one throughout the year.

"This is a pilot program, and when we see how it works and if there are any structural problems, then we can expand it to a bigger scale," Quinley said.

To further reduce alienation of groups identified as minorities on campus, Asian, Hispanic, and Native American cultural centers are being developed in three UMass residential areas and are scheduled to open this month. The Malcolm X Center will continue to be available as a Black cultural center.

Housing services provided funding for the centers, and the dean of academic services office will provide a staff member for each, Quinley said. Students who use the centers will determine the events held in each.

Although she conceded that some may feel the centers have the potential to further isolate students of color, Quinley said, "I feel the centers are very important in giving identity and that identity brings self-confidence and self-confidence is a basis for interaction."

Ric Townes, associate dean of students, emphasized that the University administration needs to be more concerned with the matriculation of all students, whatever their race.

"Over the past five or six years, I have gotten to know many students equipped to make it at UMass, who haven't," he said.

Townes, like Quinley, cites a combination of academic, social, and financial reasons for students dropping out. "One can't separate the social environment from the academic environment," he said.

The mentoring program and cultural centers are appropriate responses that have been successful at other universities. But, UMass needs to adopt a strategy that link all programs, he said.

"If I don't feel comfortable," Davis said, "I'm not going to achieve."

Also, financial support remains a gaping hole in the University's strategy.

"A minumum of sixty $5,000 awards are urgently needed," the OIRP report states. Only 15 such scholarships — which provide tuition alone — are presently available.

"We are aggressively seeking more funds," Quinley said. Contributions from insurance companies, and voluntary payroll deductions from faculty and staff for minority scholarships are potential sources being investigated, she said.

Other actions planned by the University include seeking funding for an outreach program into Massachusetts middle schools that would encourage students of color to follow a college-preparatory curriculum in high school.

"One year in the Mainstream program cannot make up for all that lost time," Rodriguez said. Quinley agreed that students need to be reached before they enter high school.

She said she ran a similar program at the University of Connecticut. "I want to do that here, but it is an expensive program to run."

Student-counselor ratios in the CCEBMS and BCP programs will also be evaluated, because the ratio is now more than 200 to one.

Quinley said the University's goal is to raise minority enrollment to 20 percent by 1992.

"We may not reach 20 percent, but we will make big strides forward," she said. "I think the real spirit of the notion is that this is a campus that values diversity and wants to be more diverse."

DESPERATE ASCENT – East German citizens have built ladders from boards and scale the walls of the West German Embassy Tuesday afternoon in a desperate attempt to reach the first step to freedom.

East Germany allows exodus to continue

PRAGUE (AP) – East Germany agreed today to let the 4,700 East Germans holed up in the West German embassy in Prague travel to West Germany, a top-ranking official in Bonn said.

Rudolf Seiters, chief of staff to Chancellor Helmut Kohl, said the first train of East German refugees would be departing Prague for West Germany tonight.

It was the second time within a week that East Germany had reluctantly agreed to allow its citizens to emigrate West. During the weekend, about 7,000 refugees fled to the West from West German embassies in Poland and Czechoslavakia.

Earlier today, about 250 East Germans stormed past police and into the West German Embassy, and witnesses said some refugees were injured. East Germany then blocked citizens from traveling to Czechoslovakia in an effort to stem the flow to the West.

Until today, East Germans needed neither a visa nor a passport to travel to Czechoslovakia. The state news agency ADN said that effective immediately, such documents would be required. That will effectively block ordinary citizens from going there.

The ADN dispatch said the move was based on reports indicating "that certain circles in West Germany are preparing provocations in conjunction with the celebrations of our 40th anniversary" on Saturday.

ADN did not say anything about changes in travel to Poland, where East Germans also have holed up in the West German embassy. East Germans currently need government permission to travel to Poland.

In Bonn, chief government spokesman Hans Klein said East German leader Erich Honecker earlier had refused to talk to West German Chancellor Helmut Kohl by telephone about the refugee crisis.

Dissident police officer testifies protesters beaten like 'wild dogs'

CAPE TOWN, South Africa (AP) – A dissident police officer testified today that riot squad members with whips and clubs attacked peaceful demonstrators like a "pack of wild dogs" at an anti-government protest last month.

Lt. Gregory Rockman, speaking at the trial of two White colleagues charged with assault, said a Sept. 5 demonstration by 30 youths at a shopping plaza in the mixed-race township of Mitchell's Plain was peaceful until riot squad members arrived and instigated the violence.

The accused, Maj. Cahrles Brazelle and Lt. David Roos, pleaded not guilty early today at the Wynberg Regional Court in Cape Town.

Rockman has become a folk hero in Black and mixed-race townships for his willingness to speak out against alleged police brutality. Youths have chanted his name at several recent protest marches.

Rockman, who is of mixed-race, said he told the youths they could demonstrate for

Columbian Supreme Court: extradition of drug suspects soon

BOGOTA (AP) – The Supreme Court will vote to approve President Virgilio Barco's decrees allowing extradition of top drug suspects to the United States and confiscation of their property, national television reported.

The television program TV Hoy, quoting court sources, reported Monday night that a majority of 24 justices on the Court supported the decrees.

The deadline for the court to rule was today, but normally several days pass before court rulings are made public.

Several bombs exploded in Colombian cities Monday night, two in the Carribean coast city of Barranquilla and two more in Santa Maria, the police said. They were part of a daily wave of bombings presumably set by drug traffickers.

A Supreme Court ruling allowing extraditions would strengthen the Barco administration in its war against the drug lords, and would help allay fears that the court could undermine the anti-drug crackdown.

TV Hoy said, however, that the court would declare unconstitutional an additional decree allowing the Colombian army to raid drug traffickers' property at will.

Soviet calls for global 'new deal'

NEW YORK (AP) – The Soviet Foreign Minister called Monday for an international "New Deal" to avert an impending economic disaster fueled by militarization, Third World debt, poverty and environmental problems.

"Right before our eyes the world is sliding into a deep economic depression," Eduard Shevardnadze said in a speech in Manhattan sponsored by the Foreign Policy Association.

"The debt of the Third World countries, the interest they have to pay and the pace of their economic development – are these not the signs of an impending catastrophe?"

He added: "We could one day be competing not for political supremacy or spheres of influence but for access to water, fresh air and even a green lawn."

Shevardnadze told the audience of about 350 people that the abolition of nuclear weapons, forgiveness of some Third World debts and increased protection for the environment will be essential for peace and worldwide stability in the next century.

Mexican president visits Bush; promises aid in anti-drug effort

Salinas de Gontari: Countries muse also work to improve trade

WASHINGTON (AP) – Mexican President Carlos Salinas de Gortari opened an official visit today and joined president Bush in promising expanded cooperation in combating cross-border drug smuggling.

With Bush standing at his side during a White House welcoming ceremony, Salinas declared that the two countries, working together, "can strike lethal blows against drug trafficking to free the world from that international scourge."

In a similar vein, Bush said that the United States and Mexico "must continue to strengthen our assault on the plague of drug use and trafficking. For we know that what threatens one nation in our hemisphere threatens us all."

Bush said relations between the two countries have progressed since Salinas took office last December, citing advances in such areas as debt, trade, investment and the environment.

He also said the two countries must cooperate in efforts to bring about democracy in Panama and free and fair elections in Nicaragua.

Salinas, speaking through a translator, said ways must be found to deal more humanely with the migration of Mexicans to the United States.

He also said the two countries must work toward a "new stage" in their trade relations.

Salinas is giving high priority to seeking trade concessions during his visit but a U.S. official, responding Monday to remarks Salinas made to reporters before leaving Mexico, disagreed with his contention that Mexico has difficulty penetrating American markets.

After the welcoming ceremony and a meeting with Bush, Salinas planned to attend a working lunch with Secretary of State James A. Baker III. A White House state dinner is scheduled for this evening.

NASA: Neptune moon active

PASADENA (AP) – Voyager 2 photographed an active geyser or volcano blowing gaseous and frozen nitrogen 5 miles high on Triton, proving Neptune's biggest moon is the solar system's third object with active eruptions, scientists said Monday.

"We caught one in the act!" said Ellis Miner, deputy Voyager project scientist at the National Aeronautics and Space Administration's Jet Propulsion Laboratory.

A NASA news release called the eruptions "geyser-like phenomenon." But with 5-mile high plumes, they can be considered either volcanoes or giant geysers, said Brad Smith, leader of Voyager's photographic imaging team.

Aide questioned in HUD probe

WASHINGTON (AP) – A Republican lobbyist with former ties to the White House told Congress Monday that he "played by the rules" in obtaining lucrative federal housing subsidies. But the head of a House panel charged he had reaped the benefits of "a greased, sweetheart deal."

Paul Manafort, a former campaign adviser to President Bush and former President Reagan and a former business partner of Republican National Chairman Lee Atwater, underwent hostile questioning from disbelieving members of a House panel probing scandals at the Department of Housing and Urban development.

Manafort, who three months ago acknowledged to the same panel that his work amounted to "influence peddling," denied being given an advance tip by insiders at HUD to the availability of HUD subsidies for renovating low-income housing projects.

State House votes no on assault weapons ban

BOSTON (AP) – Strong grass roots support, effective politicking and a persuasive speech from a leading legislator turned back the powerful anti-gun control lobby as the House voted 104-44 against a home-rule petition that would ban assault weapons in the city of Boston.

Rep. Richard T. Moore, D-Uxbridge, led the floor debate against the measure, arguing that legislation against objects does nothing to stop crime and that criminals will still be able to obtain the weapons.

"All it does is create a false sense of security for Boston residents and penalizes those who obey the law," he said.

The measure had been given little chance of passage early in the day, but strong arguments from Majority Floor Leader Charles Flaherty of Cambridge and constituents ringing their representatives telephones off the hook all morning swayed opinion.

The home-rule petition would ban the sale, use or possession of an assault weapon within the city limits. And it would require those who already own an assault weapon to seek a permit from the police commissioner.

"As the debate went on, I felt the vibrations," he said. "I wouldn't have bet on it for a $1 million before. But I'm pleasantly surprised."

The National Rifle Association and other anti-gun control groups argue that the ban would be a crack in the dike and make it difficult for sportsmen to obtain the weapons.

But Flaherty scoffed at that argument, saying the guns were designed to fire "a hail of bullets in front of advancing troops, and any sportsman who needs to shoot a dear 30 times to bring it down ... is not, in my mind, a true sportsman."

■ 'New Deal'

"Radical bold steps are needed, a kind of 'New Deal" a transition to a policy that would draw developing countries into the scientific, technological and information revolution," he said.

In the 1930s during the Great Depression, President Franklin D. Roosevelt promised Americans a 'New Deal" of government-sponsored social welfare programs.

Shevardnadze compared pessimism over the future of perestroika, the economic liberalization of the Soviet Union, to pessimism over the future of capitalism during the 1930s in the United States.

20 minutes, then they should disperse. He said they agreed.

However, a riot squad under the command of Brazelle and Roos arrived minutes later and told the marchers to leave immediately.

When the youths remained, police "just stormed the people" and began "brutally attacking them" with whips and clubs, Rockman said. "I thought at that time it was like a pack of wild dogs," Rockman said.

He said police also began beating bystanders.

"Four hefty white policemen" attacked a woman in her twenties who was waiting for a bus, Rockman said. When she and others tried to run away, police ran after them, striking from behind, he said.

Rockman said that when he asked Brazelle to call off the riot squad, the major threatened to arrest him.

The Ipso facto friendships

"Dear Miss Manners:

There is a boy in my class that I like, but I don't know how to tell him . . .

Gentle reader: . . . Showing a person that you like him, before you know that he likes you, is incautious at any age. So how, you may ask, do mutual likings ever get declared?

. . . [Try] flirting . . . find an excuse to talk about something harmless . . . If this meets with enthusiasm, suggest an unromantic reason for getting together privately . . .

The point is to retain, at every step of the way, what diplomats and spies call deniability. In each of the above cases, you can treat your behavior as mere friendliness, occasioned by mutual interests. There should never be clear evidence that you care for someone before there is clear evidence that it is mutual."

Syndicated etiquette dictator
Judith Martin.

Declaration of "mutual likings"? Retain "deniability"? "Clear evidence" of caring? Has it become necessary to hire an attorney to manage our personal relationships?

Darren Garnick

If you are frustrated with a friend or relative, forget about obsolete concepts like trust and cooperation. Leave interpersonal communication to the lawyers. They know what is best for us.

Welcome to the Era of the Binding Contract. A crisis properly outlined beforehand will emerge as a non-crisis. Problems are pre-solved on paper, guaranteed with signatures.

This legal approach to friendship has been adopted by UMass Housing Services. The administrative geniuses recently introduced a "Roommate Agreement" form to "insure basic needs."

Before the agreement is consummated, a list of 12 guidelines must be negotiated. The guidelines include "noise tolerance, sharing of possessions, phone and refrigerator usage, advance warning of visitors" and the often debated "Temperature of room: Open vs. closed window."

Peter and Brian, two roommates living in the Orchard Hill area, had a tough time negotiating clause number six: "Communication: How do we agree to communicate to each other when there is a problem?"

They finally decided on "interpretive dance."

Housing Services has also drafted their own "Bill of Rights," suggesting that the one in the U.S. Constitution is inadequate. Protected under the document, are the "right to sleep, the right to one's personal belongings, the right to free access to one's room and the right to a clean environment in which to live."

Unfortunately, this legislative mentality is not confined to administrative brochures. My fiesty roommate is ready to take a trivial domestic dispute to the Supreme Court.

"Tom" (a pseudonym) expresses outrage at the depletion of the Earth's ozone layer. He shows no concern, however, over the layer of his un-laundered clothes blanketing our bedroom. When I dropped subtle reminders that we agreed to leave at least a portion of our carpet on display, Tom shot back that we only had "an oral agreement."

Tom, a card-carrying member of the American Civil Liberties Union, frequently squawks about the First Amendment. Dirty clothing by itself may constitute "freedom of expression." But once the laundry-parasites compete for my habitat, Tom is no longer covered.

It took a guy like Tom — the prototype zealot for a lost cause — to change my mind. Maybe legal intervention is a viable alternative to salvage a friendship. See you in court!

Still waiting for the Senate to take some real action

On Tuesday I participated in the Student Senate elections, again.

They already had elections once last week, and somebody won and somebody lost, but that wasn't good enough.

So I voted again.

I have no particular faith that these new and improved elections will be qualitatively superior to the bad, old elections, but voting always gives me a chance to see if anyone I know is on the ballot.

Al Arpad

Like I said, I already voted last week, but the Commuter ballot is so long I pretty much forgot who I voted for.

Fortunately, somebody handed me a list of Progressive candidates, and that made voting very much easier.

Some of my friends who take these things seriously were nervous, wondering whether the Student Senate would ratify the new elections, and whether anyone would vote, since the Collegian announced the elections.

I've watched the Student Senate pretty closely for a couple of years now, and my attitude is more relaxed.

The way I see it, whoever gets elected will be a UMass student, and UMass students are the best the Commonwealth has to offer. So it doesn't matter much which way the elections go.

Besides, even if we elected a bunch of Harvard students, they couldn't do much without leadership.

The Student Senate has been without leadership for a good long while now.

People are fond of saying that student politics is all messed up because of apathy.

But that works both ways.

The absence of leadership generates apathy, and that in turn discourages the people who might be able to articulate a viable vision of the future.

Without that vision and imagination, reactionary forces on the right and the left take over.

It's important to recognize that republicans aren't the only reactionaries. Anybody who talks in slogans with one eye on the opinion polls is a moderate reactionary.

Anybody who talks in slogans without watching opinion polls is an extreme reactionary.

Both types cause apathy in intelligent people, because reactionary behavior is simply the failure of critical thought.

It's probably more than coincidence that the failure of critical thought is going on at the state and national level as well as in the Student Senate. This stupidity will eventually cause more people to become uncomfortable, and those people may finally produce the new ideas that will get the whole process started again.

Of course, here at the university, extraordinary budget cutting has caused some people to get prematurely uncomfortable.

Those people are already at work, although they can be hard to find.

Two student leaders in particular deserve recognition.

Student Government President Tracy Davis and Student Trustee Eric Nakajima are working hard to improve student prospects at UMass, and they would both welcome any input.

On the state level, the former Chancellor of the Board of Regents of Higher Education, James Collins, is pushing a ballot initiative to raise money for schools. He needs people to get signatures.

So there are opportunities for anybody who is tired of waiting for the Student Senate to act.

The same thing applies to the rest of the country, but those elections aren't until next year.

Take part in Civility Week

Civility Day was initially proposed by Frederich Hurst in his 1987 report which investigated the October 27, 1986 racial incident in the Southwest Residential area.

Hurst concluded his report with 16 steps the campus might take to improve its racial climate. In a section entitled Education, Hurst made several suggestions, including Civility Day, "a day for guest speakers as well as reflection, and for the Chancellor to re-affirm his and the University's commitment to the challenge of creating a positive racial climate on the campus and in the society at large."

Britt Alschuler

In the spring of 1988, the Faculty Senate passed a resolution supporting the creation of an annual Civility Day, and forwarded this recommendation to the Chancellor. The Chancellor appointed faculty, students, and staff to the first Civility Day Coordinating Committee.

The Committee identified a theme, set basic goals and invited the 32,000 students, staff, and faculty on the campus to sponsor events.

The 1988 theme was "Focus on Racism."

In response to the Committee's invitation in 1988, over 100 educational and cultural events were held. Due to this large response, Civility Day was transformed into a Week.

This year the Coordinating Committee has identified a theme — Living Up to Our Mission.

". . .We have a strong commitment to continuous improvement of the climate of civility on the campus, both affirming and fostering the values underlying diversity, and moving the campus forward toward ambitious goals for affirmative action and equal opportunity."

Our goal is to achieve a multicultural campus where men and women of diverse racial, social, and economic groups play major roles and, in a spirit of mutual respect, come to understand and appreciate the variety of perspectives which diversity makes possible."

Based on this statement, the Committee has chosen two specific goals for Civility Week 1989: Define a multicultural campus (and the steps to achieving such a campus) and creatively explore issues of human commonality and difference.

The only qualification for a "Civility Week Event" is that it relates to one of the goals.

Dialogue, discussion and exploration of any related issue can take many forms.

Ask your professor to address their subject matter from a multicultural perspective, or request a relevant guest lecturer, discussions, class projects, or debates.

Invite a faculty member or administrator to lunch or dinner (the Dean of Students Office has free meal tickets for them) or to your residence hall.

Sponsor a film, social gathering, march or demonstration, dance, performance, art exhibit, speak-out, workshop.

Invite community members on campus to share resources or explain programs.

Sponsor events that affirm and celebrate the positive aspects of our community, or build coalitions between groups and resources on campus.

The nature of Civility Week, the scope and form of events, are limited only by the extent and nature of the participation of the UMass community.

Chemical is for beneficial research

To prevent hordes of D.O.D. protestors from invading the 14th floor of the Graduate Research Tower, I would like to point out a serious error in the Collegian article on the accident that occurred last Wednesday night involving phosgene ("Student, wife injured after project explodes," Sept. 29), which is not a "nerve gas" as reported.

The term nerve gas generally refers to a chemical which, when used as a weapon, attacks the central nervous system causing paralysis and death.

When using the term "nerve gas," the connection with chemical warfare is inescapable. Phosgene, which has been used as a chemical weapon, can cause severe pulmonary edema or pneumonia as correctly reported in the Collegian, but does not attack the central nervous system and therefore is not a nerve gas!

The same properties that make phosgene toxic to humans also make it an invaluable tool in the synthesis of useful chemical compounds having nothing at all to do with chemical warfare.

Many toxic chemicals (some also used as chemical weapons) are used routinely in beneficial research and with the appropriate precautions, can by used safely.

Accidents happen, however, even to the most conscientious researcher and the fact that no one was injured in this mishap is a testament to the effectiveness of the campus emergency facilties.

The use of these chemicals should in no way suggest that the research is even remotely related to any aspect of chemical weapons.

On a campus sensitive to research funded by the military, the inappropriate and irresponsible use of a potentially inflammatory term like nerve gas is inexcusable.

Please tell the protestors, wherever they are, that there is no research on nerve gas or any chemical weapons being conducted in the Graduate Research Tower!

Rourke is Handsome but Johnny is not

By GEORGE LENTZ
Collegian Correspondent

Mickey Rourke is an actor who believes in finding a little bit of himself in each of his characters. When he was ten years old, his parents divorced, and Rourke sought out his frustrations through various outlets. Unable to keep out of trouble, he got himself off the streets and into the neighborhood gyms, where he became an amatuer boxer. Rourke eventually found his way to New York, where he studied acting for ten years while supporting himself with odd jobs as a nightclub bouncer and pretzel vendor.

THE SCREENING ROOM

He finally got his break, playing the small role of a greasy ex-con explosives expert in Lawrence Kasdan's Body Heat. This led to bigger roles, in Barry Levinson's Diner, Stuart Rosenberg's The Pope of Greenwich Village, and Adrian Lyne's 9½ Weeks. Although each character can be said to be representative of Rourke in one way or another, perhaps none parallels the frustrations Rourke endured as a child than his present character in Walter Hill's latest thriller Johnny Handsome.

Set in the steamy back alleys of rain slicked New Orleans, the film follows the pained existence of a small time crook, John Sedley. Born with a deformed face and tagged with a viciously cruel nickname, Johnny's life hasn't been an easy one. His mother died of a drug overdose when he was 13, leaving him to walk the streets, and fend for himself.

Emotionally scarred by his mother's death and his own physical appearance, Johnny slipped into a life of crime with his best and only friend, Mike (Scott Wilson). Mike sets up a job with two strangers, the psychotic Rafe (Lance Henriksen) and his foul-mouthed moll Sunny (Ellen Barkin), neither of whom Johnny particularly trusts. Johnny's suspicions about them are confirmed when they kill Mike and leave Johnny behind to take the fall.

When a prison hit set up by Rafe fails, Johnny is put into the hospital where an idealistic plastic surgeon (Forest Whitaker) comes to his rescue. Convinced Johnny's criminal behavior is a consequence of his appearance, he offers Johnny a new face and a new start in life, provided he stays straight. With parole arranged and a new job, Johnny embarks on his new life under the careful scrutiny of Morgan Freeman's callous detective who knows Johnny can't resist revenge.

It isn't until Johnny meets Donna (Elizabeth McGovern) that his life is thrown into conflict. Johnny falls for her, but the memories of his past haunt him, making him unable to settle into a normal life. "I still feel like I'm wearing a mask," he tells Whitaker during his psychiatric evaluations. "I can't forget who I was."

Ellen Barkin seduces Mickey Rourke in Johnny Handsome

Although healed of his deformity, his emotions remain in a shambles. He yearns to put his past behind him and pursue Donna, a symbol of the future. But the bitterness of his past won't subside until he eliminates Rafe and Sunny, the two remaining links. Johnny knows he can't go forward without healing the pains of his past, and the vendetta wins out.

The film works on these two levels, but Hill prevents it from developing into its full potential. The film loses its identity halfway through, when Hill alters its focus, pulling our attention away from Johnny's internal conflict to concentrate on his plot for revenge. Johnny Handsome is not a story about revenge; it's a story about redemption, and the conflicts involved in leaving the past behind to start over again.

It's a frustrating film to watch, because Hill spends the first 45 minutes establishing it as a very effective film noir. He builds Ken Friedman's script into a brooding, dark alter-ego to Rebel Without a Cause. The film's opening title sequence captures Johnny in slow motion, walking the dimly lit streets of New Orleans, averting his face from passerby as the soundtrack rumbles with thunder. It's an effective opening that gives the film a pulse; a slick, dark undercurrent that draws us into Johnny's tragic world. But just when Hill's allowed the story to develop, he carves its heart out, robbing it of its soul

Despite Hill's misdirection, the performances manage to keep the film from self-destructing. Rourke, in one of the better performances of his career, is appealing as the story's tragic figure. When his bandages are removed and he stares into the mirror, his eyes swell with tears, he has won us over; we want the poor bastard to make it. There's a sense of pleading innocence in his eyes that vindicates Johnny as the unfortunate victim of an unsympathetic, comically conscious society.

Barkin and Henriksen, as Johnny's nemesis', turn in hard-edged performances that pack a venomous bite, giving the film an energetic drive. Johnny Handsome isn't a total loss. Friedman's heart-felt intentions sustain the film, even though Hill abandons them, running the film through a field of genre cliches.

Expected soon is Roland Joffe's Fat Man and Little Boy. Written and directed by Joffe, whose credits include The Killing Feilds and The Mission, Paul Newman stars as a U.S. general supervising the experiments in a New Mexico lab that gave birth to the atomic bomb in 1943. After seeing the film's coming attraction trailer and reading several articles on its production, this one could be the film to beat for best picture.

We're No Angels stars Robert De Niro and Sean Penn as a couple of cons-on-the-run posing as priests. Written by David Mamet (House of Games) and directed by Neil Jordan (High Spirits), the film is expected in late November or early December for a holiday release.

Eurythmics stand tall with new album

By AL KAUFMAN
Collegian Staff and LYNNE WU
Collegian Correspondent

We Too Are One
Eurythmics
Arista

Eurythmics can't do anything the normal way. While most bands tend to maintain the same sound after they make it big, Eurythmics have chosen to constantly evolve.

The duo of Annie Lennox and Dave Stewart first hit the scene in 1983 with their techno-pop smash "Sweet Dreams (Are Made of This)." The song firmly established them with the other electronic noisemakers of the time, bands such as Madness, Flock of Seagulls, Falco and Men Without Hats. They were harmless synth wonders riding the popular wave.

Now all those other bands have fallen by the wayside, but Eurythmics have only gotten better, and We Too Are One is their most consistant and mature work to date.

The band has long since abandoned their electronic sound in favor of the Motown, hard guitar sound. It worked best on their hit singles "Would I Lie To You," "Sexcrime (Theme from 1984), "Missionary Man," and "I Need a Man." But although their talents have improved, they have yet to equal the success of "Sweet Dreams." This album will not be the one to do it either. For, although it is full of that edgy tension that Eurythmics thrive upon, (Lennox and Stewart were once lovers) there are no stand out tracks that scream top 40.

No songs on this album cook with the heat of "I Need a Man." The closest it comes is with the title track and "Revival," both of which have a shot at becoming club hits.

But for the most part, We Too Are One stays on an even simmer and occasionally sizzles. Lennox, who we know is unequaled when she lets her voice go all out, is just as captivating when she holds back. Cuts like "(My My) Baby's Gonna Cry," "Sylvia" and "You Hurt Me (And I Hate You)" would lose some of their angst and torment if sung in any other manner.

The ballads are just as wonderful. "Angel" is probably the most overused word in rock titles, but this is the first song worthy of the sensuous word. And who else could sing it except for the woman with the voice of a heavenly creature.

"Our music is based on opposition. It's about the friction between pain and beauty," Lennox said. In We Too Are One, that friction produced one of the strongest and complex albums of the year.

Go sing the blues and become a star

By PAUL D'AGOSTINO
Collegian Correspondent

Tune up your Fender Strat and polish your harp, for the third annual Blues Jam hits the Hatch this evening. Anyone who wants to sing or play the blues should pack up their instruments and go down to the Hatch at 9 p.m. Hosts/organizers of the event are the members of the band Ed Vadas and the Fabulous Heavyweights.

"It's for the people who get a kick out of playing the blues," said Vadas. The Fabulous Heavyweights will first play an hour set. After that, people can come up and play. It's on a first come/first serve basis, except for people who contact Ed Vadas ahead of time to reserve a spot.

PREVIEW

"We have different players every 2 to 3 hours as the night goes on," he said. "It also gives people who play a chance to play with a professional band," Vadas explained. One member of the band is always on stage to help keep things organized. Everyone gets to do two songs. Most people who play are UMass students who like to play blues. It is not required that you bring an amplifier, just an instrument and a heart and soul for the blues.

The Northampton-based Heavyweights have been around for about 8 years. Band personell has changed over the years. "We've done very well in the rhythm and blues genre," Vadas admitted. The Fabulous Heavyweights have played up and down the East coast, and have gone as far south as Florida.

They recently released an album entitled Rock the House. Musicians in the band include Ed Vadas on guitar, harmonica, and vocals, recent UMass graduate John Nathan on drums, Al Fuller on lead guitar, and Jeff Mitchell on bass. "We are a professional band," said Vadas.

"I have been involved with UMass for the past 20 years," said Vadas, whose accomplishments include creating the Bluewall in 1970. He is also credited for organizing events such as the Blues Jam and performing in the Hatch and the Bluewall. So, if you've got the blues in your shoes and want to jam with other blues musicians, head on down to the Hatch.

Pop Indie lets new bands strut their stuff

By SAAD HOPKINS
Collegian Staff

Independent music or "indie-pop" is not a recent invention. The term was founded during the late 70's as a way to describe non-commercial music. The Buzzcocks, Undertones and Ramones and similar bands from that time period eventually made the expression legitimate.

Although British indie groups have had quite the influence on world music, it has been the Americans in particular over the past three years who have had a tremendous impact on musicians from all over the globe. Bands like The Pixies and Dinosaur jr. have become everyday college radio station names. Even British bands have attempted to replicate this new sound, as opposed to vice versa. My Bloody Valentine and Primal Scream are good examples of this. But these bands are now considered the "big-wigs" of indie-pop, sometimes sounding more pop than indie. However, crawling from underneath the rock is an even more radical form of independent music, or "underground-indie" rock. Rock 'n' roll may be here to stay, but what is it's new definition? We now have indie bands that are developing new sounds and exploring strange musical turf. The Sub-Pop label, based in Seattle, Washington, for instance is one of those psychotronic underground-indie lables.

One of their greatest decisions was to sign the French band Les Thugs. Their EP Chess and Crimes is good thrash fun of the 70's, only cranked-up and blasted-out. They sound like Green On Red only not as burnt. "Sunday Time", the flip side, totally kicks ass. It has melodic R.E.M-like pop chords (but not as unlistenable), put to sonic force. You get your four-and-a-half bucks worth for sure.

Nirvana is a band worth taping, but sound as if they put too much mousse in their hair before they went into the studio. Love Buzz might be comparable to early Dumptruck only not as adventurous. In fact, they sound frighteningly like those poser bands of the mid eighties. Their attempt to generate some steam only results in failure when you listen to the B-side Big Cheese. Naturally there is no lyrical value, and can put you to sleep if put on a cassette with other Sub-Pop acts, but we can't give up on the hope that their debut album might be better than this.

The highly regarded Mudhoney are Sub-Pop's most valuable asset. Their EP SuperFuzz BigMuff is pure joy for the ears. The lead singer has a voice that sends chills up the spine, and those psycho-guitar sluts really know how to jam. These freaks wail over Soundgarden for best early Deep Purple sound-alikes, and their two seven inchers are really great. The first, "Sweet Young Thing Ain't Sweet No More", is deranged, deformed sounding and has real sick intentions. If you like this sort of thing, you'll love "Burn it Clean", their most recent 7 inch and 12 inch is pretty funny with a riff that goes a beat further than it's supposed to. Yet, low and behold it all works.

It's backed with "You Got it (Keep it out of my Face)", a song that tries its best to agitate and succeeds. For lack of better term, Mudhoney are adorable. They grow on you in such a way that you can't turn you back on them. Even their weakest effort, Halloween is amiable in its' attempt. How many bands can get away with sounding like they came from hell without coming off as laughable? The beginning is moody, with a Joy Division bass line that suggests Ozzy Osborne will come on the mike any second. It's comical, even the "I Wanna' Be Your Dog" ending. They share this single with noise-veterans Sonic Youth, whose cover of Mudhoney's "Touch Me I'm Sick" is cute for about one-minute, though shortly thereafter one concludes that maybe they are the talentless nitwits everybody keeps saying they are. Check out that J.Mascus-wannabee guitar solo.

Sub-Pop is also getting some help from friends Pussy Galore by collaborating on a cute piece with new-comers to the label, Tad, who've just released their debut LP, God's Balls. Black Flag would be proud of Tad if they heard the cover of their song "Damaged", that is if they weren't all brain dead and drunk. So as the case with the flip-side, in which Pussy Galore continue to reign as true irritators. "Damaged II" is better than Tad's version, but in all fairness, they can't be compared. Pussy Galore are in a class all by themselves.

New book of poetry reflects a woman's maturing

By W.J.GEORGIADES
Collegian Staff

Ruminations : Poetry, Images and Memories is a book of that expresses the feelings of a girl growing into a young woman.

It is also, by it's very existence, an example that young writers can get published and retain complete creative control over their work. The book is by Clarinda Rose Turner, a UMASS senior majoring in Women's Studies.

The work included in the book was created when the author was "between the ages of seventeen and twenty-two years old," and eloquently illustrates the growth of a young woman. While the work does at times bely Turner's age it consistently expresses the truth of a feeling, the truth of a moment; moments that many will relate to, and others will be affected by. "The poems reflect the maturing of someone who never had a childhood but was a child," Turner said.

In the first poem of the book, "Description of Frustration" Turner uses extremely effective imagery to express the intangibility of thought. The poem requires several readings due to the density of the imagery and the feelings being expressed. Turner says that "The poem was written in response to a man who told me he never felt frustration so I wrote it to tell him how I felt."

The title of the book is a fair indication of the material in it. It is filled with poetry , photos, and vignettes that could pass as poems "I write vignettes, I find the best way to communicate is usually through images."Turner said. The photos themselves express a variety of perceptions of life but are rather limp compared to the bold conjurings of the words.

The book's main quality is it's honesty. The book lacks the pretentiousness so prevalent in my work, and the work of so many other young people.

Another interesting aspect is the way in which the poems are layed out. The syntax is different, visually, but the purpose of its abstractness is beyond me.

Ruminations: Poetry, Images and Memories' is availiable at Lunaria Bookshop on King Street, in Northampton, the Albion cafe in Amherst and at Food For Thought Inc. in Amherst. The book costs $4.00. A copy may also be obtained through contacting Miss Turner at Box # 483.

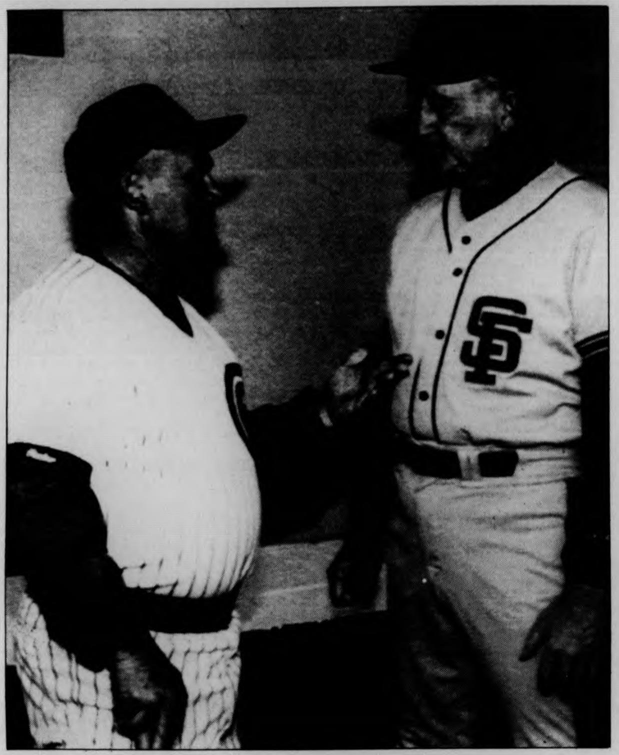
'The Gerbil' reflects on old days during time of joy



AP photo

CHICAGO (AP) — He was 58 years old and had never been kissed quite like that before. And so he blinked and blushed and shivered, from the tips of his toes to the silver nubs on the top of his head.

"I've been kissed more times tonight than by my wife in 38 years," Don Zimmer said, fording a stream of champagne and tears in a jubilant Chicago Cubs locker room last week.

Like most everything else Zimmer says, this, too, had the ring of truth about it. Baseball had broken his head and his heart more times than he could count, but it has been his mistress two years longer than the former Jean Bauerle has been his wife.

They were married at home plate in Elmira, New York, before a night game on Aug. 16, 1951, when he was phenom being groomed to succeed the legendary Pee Wee Reese as shortstop for the Brooklyn Dodgers. Soot, who had been his sweetheart since the 10th grade at Western Hills High in Cincinnati, was still naive enough to believe in the romance of being a baseball wife.

Two years later, on a hot July night in Columbus, Ohio, those dreams were shattered forever. Don Zimmer lay half-dead at home plate, struck on the left temple by an overhead curve from right-hander Jim Kirk. There were cracks in his skull of such frightening width and depth that doctors used buttons made of a rare metal called tantalum to hold what remained together.

"I remember my doctor telling me when I left the hospital, that when you have brain surgery a lot of things happen to you. He said, "You ain't never going to be the player you were," he said.

"I said, 'That's it.' And I never thought about it again."

The doctor, of course, turned out to be right. Zimmer lasted 12 years in the major leagues, playing in the 1955 and 1959 World Series with the Dodgers and earning an All-Star berth in 1961. But the skills that promised grand things predicted in the bloom of youth withered in the early years of manhood.

Under the warm sun of an autumn afternoon in Wrigley Field, he hits fungoes toward the outfield and watches the parabola of the ball begin its soft descent toward the lush green grass.

Every so often, he turns away from the task at hand to field queries from reporters, alternately bristling at the questioners and answering in the short, ungrammatical bursts that have become his signature. When he is bored, he'll use the bat handle to scratch out little patterns in the reddish dirt under his spit-shined shoes.

Don Zimmer did not come by patience easily, and though he has had a lifelong affinity for the ponies, he was not always comfortable tempting fate on a baseball diamond.

His notion of when to call for the pitchout or the suicide squeeze, his feel for the rookies, retreads and aging veterans that turned baseball on its ear in this wackiest of seasons came by running his hands over every texture the game has to offer, not by inspiration.

Indeed, he couldn't even discern when his own playing days were over, and when no one else on these shores would have him, Zimmer played one final season for Japan's Toei Flyers in 1966 with a broken toe.

That lesson learned, he returned to the states the following year and took a job managing Double-A Knoxville in the Southern League.

The meals were always cold, the nights hot and the apartments rented. He was returning from a road trip when his son was born and at spring training when a daughter followed. It was a vagabond's life, but it was a living and besides, Zimmer knew little else but baseball. And by 1972, when the San Diego Padres punched his ticket back to the big leagues, it all seemed worth it.

Yet, if Zimmer was ready for the big leagues, they were not ready for him. Schooled by stern mentors like Fred Hutchinson and Charlie Dressen, Zimmer managed like a man time forgot.

Sporting the same brush cut he wears today, he was baffled by his players' long hair, and seemed stuck in an era when ballplayers sat in hotel lobbies on the road and played cards together instead of retreating to far-flung corners, reading stock tables by themselves.

Whenever someone's play displeased him - which was often - he threatened the offender with a bus ticket back to the minors, forgetting, it seemed, that most had guaranteed contracts and no one traveled by bus any more. He thought they should be counting their blessings, not the dividends on their investments.

It all caught up with him by the end of 1973, and getting fired from a job on one coast, Zimmer headed East and wound up coaching for the Boston Red Sox through 1976. He moved back into the manager's office when the ever-present ax fell on someone else.

The new Don Zimmer kept counsel mostly with himself and his Red Sox teams won 91 games or more for three consecutive seasons (1977-1979), but never a division title. In 1978, Boston blew a 10-game lead, losing the AL East crown to the New York Yankees in a one-game playoff when Bucky Dent became a folk hero with his unlikely home run swing and Zimmer became a marked man.

He lasted two more seasons in Boston, hung on to the managerial merry-go-round in Texas for two years, and in 1983, wound up back in a coaching box on the East Coast, this time with the Yankees.

Zimmer, never one to question fate, figured his shot at the helm had come and gone. After six seasons, boyhood friend and now Cub's general manager Jim Frey told him he had figured wrong.

But when round, stubborn, fuzzy-headed little Don Zimmer with the chaw in his cheek came bob-bob-bobbing into town behind Frey last year, the experts called it cronyism and turned thumbs down.

Zimmer, though, has turned his critics around. His doughy face, roly-poly figure - now considerably slimmed by a season-long diet - and high-wire act on the line of common sense make him an easy man to underestimate.

But he has been tested by fire and kissed by fate and very little scares him anymore. When his untried ballclub lost eight of nine during one stretch this summer, a reporter asked Zimmer whether it was time to start worrying.

Minutemen polo to swim tonight

Plays at Amherst College

By JOHN STEVEN MARPLE
Collegian Staff

For all of you who've said you always wanted to see a water polo game but never had the opportunity now is your chance. The University of Massachusetts water polo team will have one of its two home games tonight against Amherst College at 7:30. All right, so it's not exactly a home game . . . actually it's at Amherst College. But hey, you couldn't have a much shorter commute to a game even if it were on the UMass campus.

The Minutemen enter the contest with a 5-5 record, fresh off a 3-1 weekend. Their lone loss was to 20th-ranked Iona.

Water Polo Notebook: Jon Miller is the top scorer on the team, with 20 goals. He's got a shooting percentage of .42 and has totaled 31 points. Brian McIver is behind Miller with 16 goals. His shooting percentage is .48 and he leads the team in steals with 12 . . . Scoring for the first time in their brief UMass career this past weekend were freshmen Jay Peluso, who racked up four against St. Francis, Bill Pendergast, Steve Jungbluth and J.P. Kennedy . . . In 40 quarters of play the Minutemen have converted on 84 of 219 shots (38 percent) . . . Conversely, they are stopping opponents shots at 43 percent rate (84-194).

her midfield spot. Forward Mara Fratassio has chipped in six goals and sophomore Dawn Trumbauer four.

The Minutewomen right now are in the midst of a very critical part of the season. Temple (No. 11 in the nation), the University of New Hampshire (No. 8) and Iowa (No. 6) are all coming up in the next couple of weeks.

"We've got a very difficult three week span," Hixon said. "We've just got to go each day."

■ women's soccer

Their top scoring threats are forwards Diane McLoughlin and Mary Beth Sydlowski. McLoughlin, a junior, leads the team in scoring with seven goals and three assists for 17 points.

Rudy describes Sydlowski, a sophomore, as being "very good in the air and quite a good leaper." She is tied with McLaughlin in goals scored (7) and second to her in points scored (14).

"They're an offensive team," said Rudy. "They attack very aggressively. They like to pressure you and are very direct. McLaughlin can cause many teams many problems."

UMass will attempt to keep UNH's dangerous duo in check with seniors Sarah Szetela and Margie Jaede and freshman Holly Hellmuth, the three middle backs. They'll be helped out by Becky Bonzano in front, almost playing like a withdrawn midfielder, and sweeper Kim Montgomery.

Senior Mary Curtis draws the start in net after freshman Skye Eddy picked up her second shutout Sunday. Curtis' 2-2-1 record is quite deceiving; in both losses to Virginia and Vermont, the number of goals she's received in offensive support — zero.

Hopefully the Reds will not put up a bagel on the scoreboard against UNH keeper Jill Lewis (4-3, 1.80 GAA). Leading the team in scoring is junior midfielder April Kater (5-4-14), junior Sue Gaudette (4-2-10), freshman Kim Eynard (2-2-6), and sophomore forward Michele Woodside (2-1-5). Kater and Hellmuth (2-2-6) are the likely scorers on cornerkicks with their excellent leaping and heading skills.

Short kicks: In this week's ISAA poll released Monday, UMass moved up one spot to eighth after the tie to fourth-ranked UConn, who did not budge in the rankings. In New England, the Reds are still second to UConn . . . New Hampshire is sixth in the region.

UNH's Anderson and Belkin to coach against alma mater

By RICK SETO
Collegian Staff

When women's soccer coach Jim Rudy takes a look over at the University of New Hampshire coaching staff, he might forget that today's encounter is a game and not an alumni all-star game or a scrimmage.

What may lead Rudy to believe that is the two-person Lady Wildcat coaching staff — head coach Margie Anderson and graduate assistant Debbie Belkin — was at one time a UMass Red.

Both have had very successful collegiate careers at UMass, each rewriting a part of the Red record book.

A 1982 graduate, Anderson's forte was and still is actually in lacrosse. She was the captain of the 1982 national women's lacrosse championship team, and most recently, helped the United States win the World Cup, the world lacrosse championship, in Perth, Australia. Anderson scored the winning goal in sudden-death overtime to clinch the title.

She wasn't too bad of a soccer player herself, holding the UMass record for goals scored in a season.

About Debbie Belkin, Rudy said, "She's probably won more awards than any other player," which is quite an accomplishment considering the long UMass soccer tradition.

She had a large part in the making of that tradition under Rudy's predecessor, Kalekeni Banda. Belkin was a four-year member of the team, spending three as an All-America halfback. During that span, UMass appeared in the Final Four all four years, culminating with an appearance in the championship against North Carolina in 1987.

In her senior year, Belkin was the team captain and was named the team's best defensive player. She also led the team in scoring with 12 goals and 5 assists for 29 points.

Reds to clash with Wildcats

UMass eighth in ISAA poll

By RICK SETO
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team (6-2-1) will head north to face the University of New Hampshire (5-3) this afternoon (3:30 p.m.), riding high on a six-game unbeaten streak.

The only reason that says 'unbeaten' and not 'winning' is Connecticut, who tied UMass 1-1 in a great overtime game last Friday.

In the Reds' Holy Cross 6-0 win Sunday, head coach Jim Rudy started five defenders in the back instead of the usual four and was able to still attack well from that formation.

"We wanted to experiment a little bit and I was pleased with what came out of it," Rudy said.

What resulted was UMass almost defending perfectly, allowing one Holy Cross shot on net, and a potent attack out of the back, evidenced by their 20 shots on goal.

The same type of air-tight defense will be needed against a Lady Wildcat team that isn't doing too shabby themselves. They are coming off a three-game winning streak, most recently blanking Providence College 3-0 Sunday.

Minutemen home against underrated Brown

By ADRIENNE MATT
Collegian Staff

Today at 3 p.m. Brown University (0-3-1) will meet the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team (2-6-1) on the Hill. After a competitive weekend, the Minutemen are mentally exhausted as well as physically banged up. Head coach Jeff Gettler is concerned about this game, as he should be. Despite the appearance of Brown's record, according to Gettler, Brown is one of the more formidable teams UMass will meet this season.

Brown's prior opponents have included the University of Maine (T, 1-1), Yale University (L, 1-0), Providence College (L, 4-2) and Boston University (L, 2-0). This is a young and inexperienced team with three to four freshmen starting at any given game.

"They're explosive on the counterattack," said Gettler of the Bears' abilities. "They're a physical team with dangerous front players."

Although he has yet to score or assist this season, sophomore Steve Lacy received second team All-Ivy and was a runner up for Ivy Rookie-of-the-Year last season. Senior Aaron Velli also received second team All-Ivy last year and has one assist for this season.

Other impressive Brown attackmen include freshman Vandy French, who currently has rung up two goals for the Bears; junior David Donovan has one goal for the year; and both senior Robert Atkins and freshman Jonah Schiller have one assist for this season. Sophomore Kendall Fargo is currently the only Bear out, due to a knee injury.

"Brown has one of the finest young forwards in New England, Steve Lacy," said Gettler. "They have a strong backfield as well."

Last year was the first time since 1954 that UMass defeated Brown. The battle last season was at home in a down-to-the-wire 3-2 match. The Bears were 0-5-1 at the time of the game and Gettler insists that their current record is no indication of how tough a team this is on the field.

"Last year we experienced a lucky win. It was a difficult game," Gettler said. "They'll be very dangerous for us. They are not Northeastern.

"I'm concerned about this game, apprehensive about it," said Gettler. "Yet I'm excited to see what we can accomplish. In the first six games we scored three goals, but in the last three games, we've scored seven goals. [Sophomore Ray] Cunha has scored three of those goals.

"This weekend [Steve] Armenti got his first win. His freshman jitters are over. He's begun to show us the aggressive brand of goalkeeper he is," Gettler said. "I believe that we've begun to find ourselves. We're beginning to settle into our own."

Field hockey to grind it out with NU

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

Forget about all the rankings, the records, and everything else. When the University of Massachusetts field hockey team hits the road to Northeastern University this afternoon for a 3:30 p.m. contest, it will be for an all-out grudge match.

And this may be exactly what the Minutewomen need at this point in the season.

"We've got to start to play with some emotion," UMass coach Pam Hixon said. "If this can't psyche us up to play with a lot of emotion, nothing can."

The incentive today for the Minutewomen is revenge for a game that was played almost a year ago at Totman Field. On that rainy Sunday afternoon, NU slipped into town and beat UMass, 2-1, in the second round of the NCAA tournament.

To say the least, it was a shocking loss to the Minutewomen who had cruised through the regular season and secured a bye in the first round of the tourney as well as hosting the regional championships. NU advanced to the Final Four with the victory.

Some of the faces have left, but many have remained. The ones that are here though have not been putting together the total effort like last season. UMass will need that today if it is to return the favor on the Huskies' home field.

"Like every day, we will have our hands full," Hixon said. "We'll just have to rise to the occasion and play for 70 minutes."

The records are almost identical with UMass coming in at 6-3 and NU at 6-3-1. Both have lost to defending national champion, Old Dominion, UMass 4-1 and NU 3-0. But the rankings are different. The Huskies have been ranked No. 7 in the latest poll released yesterday by the NCAA and the Minutewomen have been ranked twelfth.

This year's match-up appears on paper to be a very even one.

"They are strong over the ball and we will have to be assertive to make things happen," Hixon said.

The combination that will be strongest over the ball for the Huskies will be senior Anne Mucera and sophomore Deborah Sweeney. Mucera has been pretty unstoppable, scoring 11 goals and one assist. Sweeney has been the set up artist scoring two goals, and racking up 10 assists.

Mucera and Sweeney will have to break UMass freshman goaltender Phillipa Scott, who has been pretty hot herself as of late. Of Scott's 66 saves in seven games, 19 of them came against Penn State on Sunday in a stellar effort, only to be turned away with a 1-0 loss. Scott had shut out St. Joseph's the day before.

Northteastern will counter with sophomore Kathy Farley who has given up 1.3 goals a game while recording 42 saves in her seven appearances.

As far as the UMass offense goes, senior Kathy DeAngelis leads the team with six goals and an assist from

Midnight Madness coming to the Cage

Midnight Madness is coming to the Curry Hicks Cage, and you can be a part of it.

The first annual event, on Oct. 14 from 10:30 p.m. to 12:30 a.m. will officially kick off the 1989-90 University of Massachusetts men's basketball season. Live entertainment will be provided by WHMP-99.3 FM. Foul shooting, halfcourt shooting, and dunking contests will be held, and prizes such as a trip to Florida, dinner gift certificates and cash can be won.

"It's really something for the students," said head coach John Calipari. "We want everyone to come out and show their support for the team."

In conjunction with this event, the men's basketball team will be sponsoring a 3-on-3 basketball tournament, open to all UMass students. There will be separate divisions for men and women, and any student with a valid UMass ID can enter.

Sign-ups will be held tomorrow through Friday, as well as Monday and Tuesday all day in the basketball office (Note: this is a change in time and place).

The tournament will begin next Tuesday at 8 p.m in Boyden Gym and will continue Wednesday night. Finals in both divisions will be played during the Midnight Madness at the Cage.

In Monday's Sports Extra article on UMass swimmer Michele Leary, a quote saying " . . . you've either got to get off the drugs, or stop swimming" was meant to be in reference to the medication she is taking to treat her ailment.

Also, the picture accompanying the story was not of Leary.

Marchers 'Take Back the Night'

By DANIELLE BIONDA
Collegian Staff

In an effort to "take back the night" for women everywhere, members and supporters of the University of Massachusetts chapter of the National Organization for Women rallied and marched last night to protest budget cuts affecting the Student Escort Service.

Denouncing all forms of violence against women, more than 60 women and men rallied on the steps of the Student Union building as seven speakers sang, read and spoke candidly about rape.

"Rape is the fastest growing crime," said the first speaker, who did not give her name. "A rape is committed every three minutes in America, and only one in 10 rapes are reported."

Carol McMaster, a UMass student, called for public expression of disapproval to every form of violence against women and demanded that society be "responsive to women as victims of this violence."

As a petition protesting the cutbacks affecting the Student Escort Service was circulated, McMaster reminded the group that public safety must be a priority in terms of funding.

"Thousands of dollars have already been cut [from our public safety department]," she said. "It must be publicly-funded.

The Department of Public Safety has suffered a $67,000 cut for this fiscal year. This cutback is expected to severely curtail the already strapped escort service, Director Dr. Arthur Hilson said recently.

Mary Frances Bishop, co-vice president of UMass NOW, said: "A lot of times [violence against women] is brushed under the carpet. People don't realize how important the escort service is to women."

After the rally, some 45 women lit candles and began to march across campus chanting "Women unite to take back the night," and "Yes means yes no means no, whatever we wear, wherever we go."

"This march is really important to change people's attitudes and promote awareness," said junior Lisa Scialla. "This is a people's issue, not only a women's issue. We aren't waging war against men. We are waging war against rape and violence." She said she does not feel safe walking through campus at night.

Men were allowed to participate in the rally, but were not permitted to march with the women because the event is a traditional "statement" for women's rights.

The women marched along "rape road," a secluded and unlit path in the Orchard Hill Residential Area, and through fraternity and sorority row without incident. Marchers called the event a success.

"There was very little harassment tonight, compared to last year," said Gina Gombar, co-president of UMass NOW. She said many sororities cheered as the protesters marched and chanted.

"I'm pleased with the turnout, although I feel the whole campus should have been here," she said.

UM president, trustees, vow to fight cutbacks

By CHRIS MUTHER
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts President David Knapp and the Board of Trustees announced yesterday at a press conference they will fight to avoid additional state budget cuts.

L. Edward Lashman, state secretary of Administration and Finance, said recently an additional five percent budget cut to all state agencies may be necessary to compensate for low revenues over the past two months.

Deans of colleges in all three UMass campuses — Amherst, Worcester and Boston — were in attendance to speak against the proposed cutback, said Joseph Cusker, a spokesman for the president's office.

The deans said an additional cutback will be "almost impossible" to handle, Cusker said.

Deans from all three universities were invited to speak on the cutbacks because they are closer to the situation and are able to offer more insight into the problems, Cusker said.

Among those who spoke at the conference was Fred Byron, dean of natural science and math at the Amherst campus. He said he felt optimistic about the results of the conference.

"I was pleased to see support fromt the Board of Trustees and pleased that they have recognized the tremendous seriousness of the situation," he said.

Byron said a five percent cut in the budget of his department alone would equal a loss of about $1.1 million. He said major departmental reductions would be required to meet the cutback.

"Business as usual would be long gone," he said.

Thomas O'Brien, dean of the School of Management, said the conference's ultimate success depends on how far the message is carried.

"The people who spoke, the deans, the president and the chairman of the Board of Trustees, did an excellent job," he said. "We're just hoping the message will be broadcast and highly understood."

He said a five percent cut to his department would result in the loss of $250,000 for this year. As a result, there would be no funds for travel expenses, equipment and the law faculty that is hired part-time to teach courses in the school.

DOD protesters resurface

Students demand an end to military research

By PAUL MORRIS
Collegian Staff

About 80 demonstrators gathered on the steps of the Student Union Building yesterday to continue protests started last spring against Department of Defense-financed research at the University of Massachusetts.

Onlookers from UMass as well as area colleges listened to speeches, chanted and sang for more than an hour as speakers repeated demands uttered last spring for economic conversion over a five year period to civilian financed research.

Last spring, a group of protesters who called themselves "People for a Socially Responsible University," drew national attention when they staged six separate building takeovers at UMass to protest DOD-financed research. Police made some 150 arrests during this period.

Susan Conrad, a first-year student at Hampshire College, gave the initial speech and said it is students' "ethical and moral responsiblity" to work toward halting military-financed research on campus.

"We are responsible to a higher duty that says we cannot allow UMass to continue researching new and better ways to kill people," she said. "Last spring, students, faculty and community activists spoke out against DOD funding and research. This year we must do it again."

Ann Ferguson, a UMass philosophy professor, voiced her support for the protesters then led the crowd in singalong while she strummed her guitar.

"You can stuff your dirty dollars. We will not be moved. Study peace not war. Teach the needy, tax the greedy. We will not be moved," she sang.

A handful of students held a counterprotest at the fringes of the crowd. One waved an American flag and another brandished a poster which read: "PSRU you have no clue."

B. Richard Hebert, a counterprotester and the business manager of the Minuteman, a campus newspaper, said UMass needs the money the Defense Department provides. He said he sees no harm in defense research.

"The research is non-classified and opened to the public," he said. "We will lose more class sections if we lose the money."

After the rally, the protesters marched to the Whitmore Administration Building and glued "work unit summary sheets," which describe the types of DOD financed research at UMass, to walls and windows throughout the building.

The doors leading to administrative offices were locked, but protesters continued to rally in the hallway.

New dean optimistic despite budget cuts

Dean-designate Dr. Robert G. Helgesen

By CHRIS MUTHER
Collegian Staff

Dr. Robert G. Helgesen, the new Dean-designate of the College of Food and Natural Resources at the University of Massachusetts, said his first tasks are proving to be formidable ones but remained optimistic for the upcoming year.

Helgesen, an entomologist from the College of Agriculture at Kansas State University, came to UMass last month to take over the 12 departments that make up the College of Food and Natural Resources.

Among his first discoveries was a lean budget, which is due to be cut again by $400,000 in fiscal year 1991. This lack forced the Cooperative Extension, the outreach arm of the college, to terminate 52 staff members and curtail several programs last month.

Also, Helgesen announced yesterday that he has recommended to Provost Richard O'Brien that the department of Food Engineering be eliminated to meet state budget cuts.

If the department is eliminated, it will be the first department to fall under the recent waves of budget cutbacks, he said.

Helgesen said the extent of the University's budget crisis was made clear to him before he left his job of nine years in Kansas, but he added that the advantages here were strong enough to warrant a move to Massachusetts.

"Massachusetts has a more diverse agriculture, not only in products, but in production as well," he said. "The interface between the urban/suburban situation is very dynamic which makes coming to UMass exciting."

In spite of the University's budget problems, Helgesen said he thinks the curtailments will "tighten" the college rather than cause it heavy damage.

"I've been at land grand universities since 1967 and they've all gone through something similar," he said. "From those experiences I know in a few years there will be a tremendous period of re-growth, and that will be a very exciting time."

Helgesen cited a four point plan the college is following in order to survive the budget crisis. The points include the termination and movement of personnel in addition to the proposed elimination of the department.

"This plan will speed up the process of keeping up," he said. "It's essential that the college has a clear picture of where the resources are going."

The college is now focusing its resources on projects that deal with the environment and biotechnology; two areas that Helgesen said shape every department of the college.

Helgesen said private companies have donated some money for special interest projects to help ease the budget crunch, but he added that the college has not actively solicited funds.

Among the aid the college has received include grants, contracts to research specific topics, contributions for equipment purchases and donations for hiring specific individuals.

Helgesen said part of this support stems from the close ties the college has with various constituents throughout the state.

Dukakis signs bill to OK wedding and business

By YANA DLUGY
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — Mark Metzger and Janet Egelston have never made unreasonable demands from life — they wanted to get married, have children and succeed in business. They never expected a fuss over their wedding and never dreamed a special law was necessary for them to tie the knot.

They decided to get married three years ago, unaware of an obscure law in their path, which dates back to the repeal of Prohibition, and forbids people related by blood or marriage from owning a brewing license and a pouring license.

Metzger and Egelston own and run the Northampton Brewery, which is technically two businesses — the brewery and a restaurant. Egelston, 28, and her brother, Peter, own the brewery and Metzger, 35, owns the restaurant, "Brewster Court Bar & Grill."

The couple first discovered the problem three years ago, when they were starting their business. "It's a good law, it keeps Mr. Budweiser from buying a restaurant for his daughter and getting all her beer for free," Metzger said. They were told they could either give up the business or not get married. They did not want to do either.

"We invested a lot in the business and we wanted to get married and have children," Metzger said.

They went to the mayor to see if there was a way around the problem and discovered it could be done — with a little luck and a lot of patience. "We could get our own personalized law," Metzger said.

State Rep. William P. Nagle Jr., D-Northampton, and Sen. John Olver, D-Amherst, co-sponsored a bill that would exempt the couple from the law.

After seven months of waiting for the paperwork to clear they got the state's blessing. Gov. Michael S. Dukakis Tuesday signed a bill, which allows the Northampton establishment to be owned and operated by relatives.

"I think we're the only couple in America that had to go to the Legislature to get married," said Metzger, who feels like a load has been lifted off his shoulders.

Metzger phoned the good news to his fiancee, who was in New York at the time. "Honey, we passed the bill, I guess we're officially in love now," Metzger told her.

Not wasting any time they set a wedding date — July 7 next year — and are planning to brew a special beer for the occasion. "I guess we'll call it 'honeymoon brew,' or 'the legislation special,' " Metzger said.

Their biggest concern now is kitchen help. "We need little slaves to do our dishes and we have to start making them right away," Metzger said, laughing. "We can have children legally now, not out of wedlock."

Metzger and Egelston met six years ago, while working on the Jackson's tour and feel confident they will be able to handle the trials of married life. "I don't think we can go through anything harder than this," Metzger said.

Student Trustee Eric Nakajima interrupted last night's Undergraduate Student Senate meeting with a special announcement concerning further budget cutbacks to the University of Massachusetts.

Nakajima, who had just returned from a Board of Trustees meeting in Boston, said L. Edward Lashman, the state secretary for Administration and Finance, is pressing for a $35 million to the statewide university system.

Under Lashman's plan, the University's budget would be depleted by $3 or $4 million, Nakajima said.

"We have to push back Lashman," Nakajima said. "It could mean the difference between 3 or 4 million dollars and 15 or 16 million dollars [in cuts]."

It is possible that entire programs and departments will be eliminated and that the University will have to close for one or two weeks as a result of the cuts, he said.

Nakajima urged students to mobilize and fight against the cuts. He said an organized student protest at the Statehouse is being planned for Oct. 18.

"The state house tends not to take students at UMass-Amherst very seriously," he said.

Senate Speaker John Dunlap read speech welcoming the senators, and encouraged them to work together in the interests of the student body.

- Sara DeSimone (Crabtree), Jason Kofman (Commuter), Dan Chesnicka (Wheeler) and Ari Weinstein (Commuter) were elected by the senate to serve on the Nominating Subcommittee.

Commuter area elections to be held at Hatch today

By KATHERINE T. LAMOTHE
Collegian Staff

The Commuter Area Government is scheduled to hold elections today for its officers and for open seats on the Governing Board, said Robert Higson, election coordinator.

Elections will be held from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. Students in the commuter area may cast their votes in front of the Hatch cafeteria.

Candidates for official positions are all running unopposed. Clarinda Rose-Turner, now acting CAG president, is running for president, Cory Schauer is running for vice president and Howard McEachern is seeking the treasurer's position.

In the race for the 13-member CAG Governing Board, there are six candidates:

Eric Renaud, Charles Lenchner, Brian-James Crawford, Christine Morton, Paul DelGallo and Nathan Moore.

These candidates were the only ones who completed their nomination papers by last Friday's deadline, according to Rose-Turner.

Other papers, including those of governing board candidates Robb Smith and Ted Chambers, were declared "missing" Friday by the pair.

Workers patch up bullet holes in the Panamanian defense ministry's exterior walls yesterday in Panama City. Life in the city began returning to normal following an abortive attempt to topple the Noriega regime.

Gorbachev: Soviet economy threatened

MOSCOW (AP) — President Mikhail S. Gorbachev suffered his first major policy defeat in the 4-month-old Soviet legislature Tuesday when it rejected his call for an emergency ban on workers' newly won right to strike.

But Gorbachev told lawmakers he was satisfied with a compromise that imposes a selective ban on strikes in critical industries. He said it would "help restore a normal life."

Gorbachev said Monday he wanted a ban on all strikes for the next 15 months to prevent anarchy from overwhelming the shaky Soviet economy. A wave of strikes, largely over ethnic and political conflicts, cost the country $5.5 billion in July and August alone.

It was the first time the new Supreme Soviet Legislature stood up to the government and opted for its own policy, though it had previously rejected several Cabinet nominees. The legislature's display of independence was particularly significant because it came on a package of emergency measures.

The compromise resolution, adopted by a vote of 364-6, prohibits strikes in the transport, energy, raw materials and mettalurgy industries, but only until the legislature passes a detailed law defining the right to strike.

That could be as soon as Monday, at the next session of the full legislature. Nearly half the articles in the strike law were approved Tuesday.

The more controversial sections, which have yet to face floor debate, would ban strikes that threatened human life or health, as well as any aimed at overthrow of the government or violation of ethnic equality. It would also ban strikes in the transportation, communications, energy, and defense industries, and among civil servants.

The draft also requires arbitration before a strike and allows the Supreme Soviet or its ruling Presidium to halt or delay strikes.

It also says those found responsible for a strike can be fired and fined up to three month's pay to help cover economic damages. It does not define responsibility, leaving open the possibility that managers who fail to resolve labor disputes could be held as guilty as strike leaders.

The emergency resolution adopted also permits the country's ministries of interior, defense, and transport to guarantee operation of the railroads in Armenia and Azerbaijan if necessary to get rail traffic moving again to Armenia.

Strikers in Azerbaijan motivated by ethnic demands created a virtual economic blockade of Armenia by interfering with shipments on the main rail and road lines to the neighboring republic. Armenia and Azerbaijan are locked in a conflict over the disputed territory of Nagorno-Karabakh, which also has been hit by lengthy strikes. Trains ship about 80 percent of the goods Armenia receives from elsewhere in the Soviet Union.

Coal miners returned to work only after Moscow agreed to a package of economic and social improvements that officials say will cost about $3 billion.

Dirty towels irk Iraqi president

BAGHDAD (AP) — President Saddam Hussein was so shocked by the dirty bathroom and dirty towels in a district governor's office that he fired him, an official announcement said Wednesday.

"If the governor himself is not clean and tidy, how ill we manage to raise the standard of our people," Saddam was heard saying on television early in the week while visiting the office of the governor of Darbandikhan, 1989 miles northeast of Baghdad.

He was shown at the time inspecting the private bathroom in the office of the governor, Mustafa Fatah.

Television viewers heard Saddam angrily rebuking Fatah because the facility and the towels were dirty and declaring that the government would fire any governor who failed to look after his district's hygene.

A decree issued Wednesday by the ruling Revolutionary Command Council confirmed Fatah's early retirement and demotion to a lower grade pension.

NAACP settles with BHA out of federal court

BOSTON (AP) — The NAACP agrees to drop its lawsuit against the Boston Housing Authority under a settlement signed yesterday in federal court that could cost the city about $3 million in damages for alleged housing discrimination.

Benjamin Hooks, executive director of the Baltimore-based NAACP, Mayor Raymond Flynn and other local officials were present for the signing of the settlement.

Under the agreement, the largest group of public housing discrimination victims eligible for up to $2,500 each in damages includes 1,050 families who applied for apartments in predominantly white developments in the Charlestown, South Boston and East Boston neighborhoods over the last decade, but were not given minority preference.

Additionally, 120 minority families who had filed claims alleging they were discouraged by the BHA from applying to white developments could receive $2,500 each.

Approximately 300 emergency housing applicants - people displaced by fire or evictions -are eligible to receive $1,000 each if they prove they could have been laced in a white development because of a BHA newspaper advertisement seeking white applicants to maintain racial balance are eligible for $3,000, under the terms of the settlement.

"We hope this sends a message to the institutions that discrimination costs,"said Dianne Wilkerson, chairwoman of the housing committee of the Boston chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

The settlement was signed before U.S. District Court Judge Joseph L. Tauro, who oversaw the extensive negotiations that ended the lawsuit filed in May 1988.

Besides the payments, the settlement requires the BHA to put up $500,000 for a fund that will make grants to encourage integration and multicultural activities in the city's public housing developments.

Striking workers from New England Telephone listen to Gov. Madeleine Kunin address them at a rally on the Statehouse steps on yesterday. The strike enters its ninth week with no progress.

New England Telephone replaces striking workers temporarily

BOSTON (AP) — New England Telephone Co. has temporarily hired workers to replace some of the striking employees who have been off the job since August, a spokesman for the company said Wednesday.

Peter Cronin, a spokesman for New England Telephone, said the new employees, most of whom would work in operator services, had been hired on a contractual basis through temporary agencies.

He declined to say how many new workers had been hired but said the company had no plans to hire permanent replacements for the striking workers.

Negotiations between representatives for about 60,000 strikers and parent company NYNEX Corp. have been stalled for weeks over salary and health care issues.

"All these employees from the temporary agencies have come to our attention from friends and relatives," Cronin said. "Most are very highly trained technical people laid off by the high-tech firms around Route 129, and we've been delighted with them."

But union representatives said the replacement workers were from elsewhere in the nation, and said it was a "shame that people would travel to bust up a strike."

"I could take you up to a hotel in Danvers and show you about 30 or 40 people from North Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, from out in the Midwest, Missouri," said David Reardon, a business agent for the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, which represents the 10,000 strikers in New England.

"They're basically hiring scabs to do our work," said Adele Stacy, of the International Brotherhood of Workers, which represents the 10,000 strikers in New England.

"But just going on the track record of scabs, we're not worried, because they don't know our equipment and they don't know our jobs," Stacy said.

Larkin: rising folk artist speaks about her craft

By PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Correspondent

When Suzanne Vega's single "Luka" popped onto the music scene a few years back, it was a breath of fresh air to people forced to listen (those trapped in pizza places) to radio station that focused on the "hits." It sounded different — it was folk. Her works exposed folk music and allowed for the transition of now famous artists such as Tracy Chapman.

Patty Larkin, a "new wave" folk singer with a decidedly different approach to folk/humor will be headlining with David Wilcox in a performance at Amherst College. A three-time winner of the Boston Music Awards including a double award for "Best Folk Album"and "Best Folk Artist" in 1986 for her album "Step Into the Light," Larkin's popularity is intensifying as folk artists become increasingly more mainstream.

Larkin is especially known for her zany humor. Although your mother said never judge a book by its cover, listen to some of the titles of her songs: "Dodge Dart," "Not So Bad for a Broad," "Pucker Up," and "He Was a Writer for the National Enquirer, She Was a Soap Opera Star."

She credits the revival of folk in the 80s to the new interest in acoustic music, chiefly guitar. "There is this style of artist centering on acoustic music that was not looked at during the early 80s," she said. "But with the rise of Suzanne Vega, more people were willing to listen. Another thing is that today's issues and attitudes are different, people are more receptive to folk."

"Being on the outside of the mainstream allows you to bring up the tough issues," she said. "The fold revival during the 60s was very much linked to the music and political action of the times."

Patty Larkin will be performing at the Amherst College Campus Center on Sunday, Oct. 8, at 8 p.m. Tickets may be purchased at the door for $7.

Notes from the Campus Center Basement

For all you beer fanatics, desperate for a better, more rich filling beer, it can be found at the Brewery in Northampton. This is definitely better than "uptown" could ever wish to be in its wildest dreams. The atmosphere is great, not a "meat market." There are munchies available at reasonable prices, and an extensive menu, but expensive on a college-student-budget. Best of all they serve PINTS, as beer was meant to be served, not in those dinky little glasses you get a regular bars. P.S. congratulations to the owners on the soon-to-occur wedding.

Peter Leon

The burning of a the American flag has obviously caught the interest of the world. This is a precarious situation. But the truth be known, the United States must allow people to burn the flag. If we start to limit our own rights to show displeasure with our government, or even not to allow a woman the right to choose to get an abortion, soon our government will start to limit our rights to do a great many things. Preservation of the of freedom speech and the right privacy, in whatever form, must be at the forefront of our concerns.

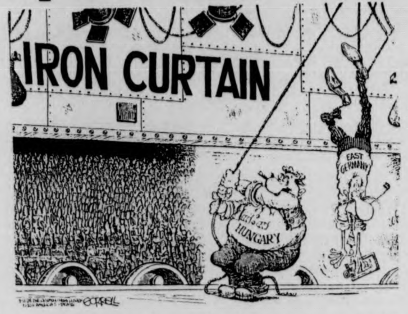
Now, why you should choose not to burn the flag: admittedly the flag does represent many oppressive actions taken by our government, but it does also stand for a lot of freedoms we as citizens enjoy.



I remember standing at the Wall, looking over to the other side. Behind me were multiple neon signs, huge glass buildings, new cars. In front of me was no man's land, a field laid with mines, where few people ever trod. Beyond that were towers, with guards, armed guards. Beyond that were just rows upon rows of what we call "projects" — tenement apartment buildings.

This wall wasn't there to keep anyone out, indeed it was to keep people in. But then I realized that the wall actually surrounded me. I was on a island in the middle of a country. This island was West Berlin, part of West Germany, in the middle of East Germany.

Later that day as I was waiting to get through "Checkpoint Charlie" I began a conversation with a British woman. There was large family in front of us, and I noticed that their passports were Czechoslovakian. The woman and I soon became aware that this family was watching us, more noticeably our passports.

This woman, who had family in the East, explained that the Czech government was allowing people to vacation outside of the "Iron Curtain." I began to understand that I could enter and leave most countries without any hassle. Not so for many people. East Germans are now escaping to the west via Hungary. So much just to be free.

The flag of the United States of America represents freedoms of many kinds. That is what this country is all about. Sometimes choices exist. Sometimes the right one is not to.

This week's quote: Loss of nationality — you may lose your U.S. nationality . . . by making a formal renunciation of nationality either in the United States or before a diplomatic or consular officer of the United States while abroad.
— Excerpted from the passport of a citizen of the United States.

To most, that is an important choice. Few other countries allow this. I think it is pretty cool.

Thus 'til next week, people, we have the right to choose — let's keep it that way.

End our ignorance

Racism. I've always disliked this word. I always associate it with evil people and events. I think of horrors such as the Holocaust and slavery.

Lately, I've heard the term used so frequently that I feel its meaning has been tainted. What does racism mean? Racism, as defined by the Merriam Webster dictionary, is "a belief that some races are by nature superior to others."

Various members of the Collegian staff and the Collegian as a whole has been accused of being racist. To me, this a very strong and powerful accusation.

Minu Sebastian

I feel concern for groups who feel isolated and demeaned, and I do agree that people need to be educated and sensitized to each other. However, I do not understand how accusations and threatening letters are going to solve anything.

The Editorial Desk has received and is still receiving many letters filled with hostile statements and remarks. All I keep hearing is "You are racist, you are racist, you are racist." When hearing these statements many people are feeling upset and emotional and are missing the entire issue which is at hand.

We need to listen to each other. Everyone is yelling and making accusations. Everyone is becoming emotional and defensive. We need to face the issue of institutional and subtle racism. But the only way to accomplish this is to talk to each other. We need to listen and try to understand each other.

As a member of the Editorial staff, I know that we do our best to represent all sides of an issue. We never intend to offend anybody. The articles and letters that we print do not represent the majority opinion of the staff.

I do feel that if various ethnic groups feel isolated and need better representation in the paper, then something should be done. Whether we should reinstate the Black Affairs page and add a Third World Affairs page, I am not clear on. All I know is that we cannot accomplish anything through harsh accusations and threats.

I know this has been said before, but I do believe that we need to work together to achieve an understanding of each other's needs.

I understand that various groups feel very frustrated. I can only imagine the anger and violation that a group must feel when they are being negatively portrayed and demeaned.

I do not believe that by accusing particular individuals of being racist will solve anything. By isolating individuals and degrading them by calling them names is detrimental and is exactly what we are struggling to end.

Each person is a unique individual with different experiences, backgrounds and concepts of life. We must keep this in mind before making judgments on each other.

To best communicate with each other, we must set aside all preconceived notions of each other and look at each other as people who are capable of learning, growing and changing.

Until then, all we will have is lasting ignorance, insensitivity and apathy.

All I want is my old hair-do

It is not the decline of Western civilization. It is not Judgment Day. It is certainly not the end of the world as we know it. What it is, is a tragedy of sorts. It is a catastrophe of daily living. It is a crushing blow to the fragile, human ego. It is the calamity of receiving a really bad haircut.

Josh Galitsky

I suffered last week the total annihilation of what I used to recognize as my hair. It was humiliating. It was downright depressing. A once proud, young man whose hair had finally reached a satisfying shape and structure was struck down in his prime by a scissor-wielding, razor-swinging excuse for a barber.

It was a simple request. Just a little off the top. A trim. Don't touch the sides. Don't touch the back. Don't touch the ears, the neck, or anywhere else. Just thin the top a tad.

The shaver buzzed hideously in my ear as the far-sighted stylist (stylist? yeah, right), mowed down my scalp. Mounds of hair plopped into my lap as I sat in the death chair. I squinted vigorously in the mirror, a desperate attempt to witness the crew-cutting assassination of my scalp. Back and forth he went with his weapons, butchering and grazing my noggin. The rest is hazy. I think I may have blacked-out.

When I rose from the chair, I was too stunned to think. I payed Mad Max and stumbled out of the room. That was after I tipped him. The mere thought of that makes me want to start therapy.

I went back to my room and stared at myself in the mirror. I cried. In less than 24 hours, I would be on a plane to Ohio to see my girlfriend, sporting the latest in the lop-sided look. My hair was half cut. One side was perfect while the other was cut short and patchy like a wilting plant. I looked like a prop in the half room from the movie Willy Wonka and the Chocolate Factory.

After my nervous breakdown, I realized that action needed to be taken. I summoned the powers that be and a woman from my floor to save my fate and head. Amy (not her real name) worked endlessly to salvage my skull. With clippers trembling in her sweaty palms, she sliced and diced, examining her work closely after each hair was cut. It took hours and prayer, but I could finally rejoin the species as a cross between Woody Allen and Willy Whistle.

The last week has been a living hell for me. No gel, no mousse, no spray can transform this haircut into something I can live with. Some say I should paint purple stripes on the side of my head. One friend said I looked like I joined the Young Communist League. My girlfriend didn't say anything . . . for a long time. The only consolation — and if I hear this one more time somebody gets hurt — is that it grows back.

I think I am a nice person, although by this haircut I look as though I don't care about anything. I didn't want to slander the creep who chopped me, but I need to send out a warning to anyone getting a haircut. Beware while on campus. The villain who performed this evil lurks in the Campus Center barbershop.

Who said this was home?

This weekend is homecoming.

It's the time of year when alumni return to re-live their wild college years. It's the time of year when all the hotels in town are booked solid. It's the time of year when there's a line outside every bar at 12 noon on Saturday. It's the time of year when everyone talks about how great "things used to be."

Cosmo Macero Jr.

It's also the time of year when I wish I was on the other side of the planet.

Is there an unwritten rule that alumni must act like complete fools whenever they visit their alma mater for a social occasion?

I honestly can't envision myself returning to Amherst in a year or two, and doing everything possible to make life miserable for all the bartenders, doormen and waitresses in town. Although, I am biased. I work at a bar, and the array of excuses and stories one hears from people is astonishing. Allow me to illustrate:

Picture a long line at a popular uptown nightspot. It's about six o'clock on Saturday. Roger Baldacci has just collected 5 touchdown passes and 463 total passing yards in a 38-7 trouncing of Rhode Island. It's raining. People in line are wet, drunk, anxious, drunk, hyperactive, drunk, ready to celebrate and drunk.

It's tough enough being able to select the few people who are actually sober enough to be admitted into the establishment, let alone dealing with those who see their lack of basic motor functions as no good reason to be refused entry.

"I haven't even been drinking," one man says. (Then why do you smell like that guy at Watroba's?)

"I used to come here every night," another fellow quips. (And we certainly do miss you, but . . .)

"I just want to buy cigarettes," a woman says. (You know, I find I too enjoy fighting a sweaty, intoxicated crowd before I make a routine two dollar purchase.)

"I just want to get my friends out." (Yeah, they're probably just having way too much fun anyway. They'll definitely want to leave and go wait in line with you somewhere else . . . not.)

And then there's my favorite line:

"I graduated," or variations like, "Dude, I graduated," or "I used to go here," or "Dude, I used to go here." What's going on? Are these people for real? I used to go here? So what!! Everyone used to go here. It's alumni weekend for crying out loud!!

Is this what homecoming is all about? Who said this was home anyway? These people aren't coming home, they're coming to harass me! Leave me alone. No, you can't cut the line. No, you can't leave and come back. No, you can't get your friends in if you slip me a twenty (okay, maybe). No, you can't just say hello to a friend. And no . . . you can't buy cigarettes. But don't get me wrong . . . I'm a nice person.

Maybe I should run for senator?

I'm sorry, but I keep finding it harder and harder to take the Student Government Association seriously. And from the looks of things, I'm not the only person on this campus who has those feelings.

On Tuesday, new elections were held in the Southwest, Greek and Commuter areas. Now this in itself is interesting. Lack of ballot box stuffing, lack of campaign material, etc. led to low voter turnout, which in turn led to a disappointing original election.

Jim Clark

Many students complained that they knew nothing about the election. Who was running, when it was being held, anything. So, what does the SGA do? It calls for a do-over.

Boy, would the Democrats have loved this. Imagine if they could re-do the last three presidential elections? (It probably wouldn't have done them any good anyway.)

My favorite quote from the original election (or lack thereof) was from the person who said, "I think it's up to the people who are voting to find out who they are voting for."

OK. I'm running for president. I'm just going to kick back in my apartment, drinking Rolling Rocks and watching ESPN while my opponents spend millions of dollars motoring around the country, shaking hands and kissing babies. As Jon Lovitz says, "Get to know me." Yeah, I'm a sure-fire winner. Right.

Folks, that's not the way it's done. I may not be a Kennedy, but even I know some of the basics of getting elected to some kind of political office. Posters, advertisements, maybe even a little door-to-door schmoozing. As putrid as the Underdog and Bloom County slogans may look on a poster, they work.

Word of mouth doesn't, especially when the majority of the campus doesn't give a damn.

All right, so the SGA did admit its mistake. And Tuesday, it tried again. So what happened? As I was passing through the Campus Center, I saw a female standing just outside the arcade, attempting to hand out literature to prospective voters. But as she was waving her arms like a spastic traffic cop and pleading for attention, people just ignored her and hurried on to watch All My Children.

The folks don't care, and I can't say I blame them.

The good people on the fourth floor haven't given us much reason to sit up and take heed. After all, when you go a full year without a president and spend most of your Wednesday nights bickering about pointless things, people are going to get fed up.

Pointless? The SGA? Pshaw.

Admittedly, I was impressed when they got right down to business the first meeting of the semester with the co-senator debate. Holy legitimate arguments, Batman. Pertinent discussion about time commitments and work obligations. I was in Heaven.

Then I took a glance at the agenda for last night's meeting. On it was a motion from a senator, which basically was trying to turn UMass into a strictly Christian university at the expense of other religions and beliefs.

Obviously this is not an isolated instance of ineptitude. Ridiculous motions such as this are always clogging up the floor, and when things of significance actually do pop up, they are usually drawn out over months of debate and filibustering. In the words of Janet Jackson, "What have you done for me lately?"

People will disagree with my viewpoint, and maybe will challenge me. "Well, Jim, if you think you're so smart, why don't you run for senator?"

Gee, I never thought about that. I've always been interested in politics. Maybe I will make an attempt sometime. Maybe I will run for the senate.

If anyone wants to know more about me, they can give me a call. Sorry, I just don't have time to campaign on my own.

Accountability...or lies

Iran-Contra. There, I said it. Go ahead and groan, roll your eyes and skip to the funny pages. Who cares that our most recent and current presidents are common liars?

Michael Greenfeig

Maybe nobody, which is all the more reason why the story should be finished. Don't look now, but Ronnie and George are in deep "doo-doo" again.

John M. Poindexter, Reagan's national security advisor who supposedly ran the illegal operation on this own authority, is about to spill some half-baked beans. With his trial date rapidly approaching, Poindexter's lawyers have requested the personal notes of both Reagan and Bush.

Their line of defense seems to be that Poindexter could not have been part of a conspiracy to maintain a secret operation when his actions were directly authorized by the president and vice-president. This makes good sense.

Ronald Reagan's most consuming passion, aside from his foot in his mouth, was the survival of the Contras. His greatest desire was to ride into Teguchigulpa on a white horse while the natives showered him with jellybeans.

Poindexter insists that Reagan took notes at all important meetings and was constantly made aware of the resupplying of the Contras. Not only was Reagan aware of these operations, but Poindexter now claims that the ex-president directed him to give answers to the investigating Congressional committees that both men knew to be false.

In plain English, Reagan not only lied to the American people but ordered his subordinate to do the same.

Of course, Poindexter could have refused and therefore must be responsible for his own actions. It just doesn't seem fair that he should get all the (dis)credit.

Our beloved Gipper has certainly earned the lion's share of the blame.

Which brings us to George "What diversion" Bush. Mr. Poindexter has a few words to say concerning his involvement as well.

While Bush has maintained that he was always "out of the loop," Poindexter is now ready to reveal that he personally briefed Bush about any meetings that the vice-president may have missed.

Bush's former aide, Craig Fuller, recently stated that Mr. Bush's extensive travel schedule during that time period would have made it virtually impossible for the vice-president to have been informed.

Since when does a person have to actually attend a meeting to know what went on?

Someone should inform Mr. Fuller about some of the great advances in technology that have occurred over the years, such as the telephone.

Mr. Bush ran his 1988 campaign on the idea that he was uniquely qualified for the presidency since he had been such an integral part of the White House as vice-president. Yet, somehow, on this key issue, he was just never around.

Now Mr. Poindexter says otherwise and that is much easier to believe. Unfortunately, both Reagan and Bush have appeared to be so stupid so often that the idea of their ignorance is never very far-fetched. This time, however, both men knew.

Daniel K. Webb, a former U.S. attorney, has been named to prosecute Mr. Poindexter, hopefully by the end of this year.

Maybe this time, the buck will not stop there.

It is not petty to desire that the truth of this matter be aired. It is not unseemingly for the citizens of a democracy to hold their leaders accountable. The only mystery here is why so many Americans are so agreeable to the corruption within their government.

There are many women's rights advocates who claim that pornographic magazines should be banned because they perpetuate a negative image and treatment of women.

There are others who believe that it's a perfectly legitimate form of expression and outlawing pornography would be an infringment on a person's First Amendment rights.

What do you think? Whose rights take precedence? Is there a middle ground?

University Without Walls valuable

I am a graduate student in the UMass English Department who teaches college writing to freshmen and technical writing to juniors. I have been a teacher and taxpayer in Massachusetts for nine years.

I am also a graduate of the University Without Walls Program at this university. I received my B.A. through the program in 1984, when I was 32 years old. Given my employment and life situation at the time, I would not have been able to achieve my degree without the unique opportunities afforded to older, non-traditional students through the UWW.

I'm saddened and outraged that this university is willing to cut a program which serves so many contributing adults in Massachusetts. Look in any corner of the state, and certainly any corner of this university, and you will find UWW graduates giving back in essential, creative ways.

It is just not right that one degree program which provides such a unique and valuable service to the citizens of the Commonwealth be cut in half, while other programs are cut by only five or ten percent.

I strongly urge Chancellor Duffey and Provost O'Brien to reconsider the drastic and deadly cut to the University Without Walls. And I call on concerned members of the state community to raise their voices against this cut. Massachusetts needs UWW in a fundamental way, as it needs many other valuable degree programs at UMass.

Abortion not a necessity

Meredith O'Brien's commentary "Closer than you think," (October 3) was a perfect display of illogical thoughts and arguments being woven into a commentary that would hopefully blind-side its readers into supporting its conclusion that abortion is a necessary part of society.

Specifically, O'Brien's statement that "people can preach about . . .adoption, but they really don't think about what happens to the mother's life while she is pregnant" clearly depicts her selfishness. O'Brien is so worried about nine months of a mother's life, that she refuses to address the fact that the life of a baby is at stake.

A baby, unborn or born, deserves the right to life. It is appalling to think that a baby should be sacrificed to ease the life of the parents. If a man and a woman make a mistake, they should pay the consequences. Cut and dry.

Please spare me the whining that claims a baby isn't alive until it is born. The only difference between a baby at the point of conception and at the point of birth is time and nutrition, which happens to be the exact same differences between a new born baby and a twenty-year-old. So why not say a human doesn't have life until after he completes maturity?

Concerning O'Brien's claim that abortion is a necessity in our society, in order to save the mother's life, C. Everett Koop, M.D., the U.S. Surgeon General says it best, "Protection of the life of the mother as an excuse for an abortion is a smoke screen. If toward the end of the pregnancy complications arise that threaten the mother's health, the doctor will either induce labor or perform a Caesarean section. His intention is to save the life of both the mother and the baby. The baby's life is never willfully destroyed because the mother's life is in danger."

I hope that in the future, Meredith O'Brien will be more informed, have a broader view on topics, such as abortion, and eliminate the selfishness she incorporates when writing on these topics.

Fairytale coverage

On behalf of the volleyball team, I would like to suggest to the writers to the volleyball coverage that they sacrifice the colorful metaphors that they have included in their articles for an accurate description of the way we play.

The articles about our team have been increasingly more derogatory. It must be known that the way we play is not always manifested by the scores, and it should not be assumed that if the scores were low that we must have played poorly.

I was sickened by the article printed on Monday, September 25, regarding our match with URI, "The Lady Rams handled UMass like a pinata at a Hells Angels birthday party, beating the Minutewomen about the head and body . . ." With this kind of press, I would be happier if our matches were not reported. It is slander and not sports information. Granted, our team is young, but we have the potential to play as good than almost any team in the A-10.

Similarly, the writers should have a better grasp for the game before they take it upon themselves to judge our play and compare us to fairy tale characters. It was not necessary to compare the volleyball team to the three little pigs, nor to say that our team's foundation was like "a house of straw."

The teams UMass played would have appreciated the article more than we did, because they received better coverage than our team. Furthermore, the bad press that the volleyball team has been getting has not instilled school pride whatsoever.

Arpad is a bit too critical

Although I would agree with Al Arpad ("Still waiting for the Senate to take some real action," Oct. 4) and extend the recognition due to President Davis and Trustee Nakajima, I fear that the rest of his article is simplistic at best.

His criticisms are not constructive, but biting, and reflect a narrow, purely argumentative approach to student government. I believe that Arpad writes with one eye to the polls, the easiest column to write is one blasting the Senate.

It is shameful that Speaker John Dunlap's courage to make substance of ideas that have floated around in the air is dismissed as a lack of leadership.

It is blind to suggest that Treasurer Laura Filkins is not a leader, as she signs transfer after transfer, sending other student leaders to Boston, allowing hundreds of RSO's to put on programs and ensuring a high degree of accountability in the Trust Fund.

Finally, it is callous to say that all the Committee Chairs and Senators have no leadership capabilities as they stay under the reform in the Senate in spite of being mocked in Collegian articles written in Ivory Towers by writers lacking the insight to support the challenge of change.

They are all leaders because they stick with it.

I can no longer tolerate these continuous attacks on the status quo and the refusal to recognize the leadership qualities in individuals for no reason other that that their job description does not allow them to address the popular or vogue issues, or someone else's personal or political agenda.

Arpad, get your hands dirty with us before you choose to fling mud again.

You ran for office once, now maybe if you did some real work you would inspire some confidence.

They repeated their recent declaration of a "Day of Action" scheduled for Oct. 25, outside of the doors leading to Chancellor Joseph Duffey's staff offices.

In an interview following the rally, Frank Bowrys, a PSRU member and former UMass student, said the group is struggling to change the research priorities at the university, state and national levels.

He said it would be wiser to spend money researching and solving the fundamental problems of society including health problems, mass transit, creating immunizations and researching solar power instead of nuclear, he said.

"It's okay to have a science-based university, but not a public university," he said. "Soon this school is going to be called UMass Polytech."

The subcommittee's first task is to appoint senators and non-senators who wish to serve on a committee to the six senate policy-making committees.

"The subcommittee's very powerful," said Chesnicka, who also served on the subcommittee last year.

Tensions rose during the nominations for the subcommittee.

The 32-senator Progressive Coalition from the Commuter Area backed a slate of candidates for the committee while a flyer announcing a separate slate of candidates was passed around the senate.

Kofman was the only member of the Coalition to be elected. Weinstein is part of the Coalition but was not on their list.

"I'm completely biased to left-wing politics, but I'm smart enough to know any politics have no place in student government," Weinstein said.

Thelonius Monk documentary: for fans only

By BILL ROSENBLATT
Collegian Staff

Monk: Straight, No Chaser, a film about the great pianist and composer Thelonious Monk, is the third in a recent spate of movies about jazz musicians. The film opened in New York recently and should reach the Valley soon.

1987's Round Midnight was about a fictitious character based on the lives of Lester Young and Bud Powell; 1988's Bird took?harlie Parker; Straight, No Chaser follows this trend to its logical conclusion, being an unadorned documentary.

First the good news:

This film is an epicurean feast for those of you who (like me) consider Monk to be one of the truly great figures in the music. It consists mostly of European tour footage — onstage and off — from the late 1960s, and more recent interviews with Monk's managers, friends and relatives. There are wonderful clips of Monk in performance with his quartet and, even better, a superb 8-piece band featuring tenor saxophonists Johnny Griffin and Charlie Rouse, altoist Phil Woods, underrated trumpeter Ray Copeland and others. There is also an all-too-brief snippet of Monk leading a trio on the late-1950s TV program The Sound of Jazz, with Count Basie looking transfixedly at the pianist as he plays.

In addition to the great music, most never before released, the film gives us the opportunity to see Monk at work, his approach to composing and arranging, his "bad" piano technique, his weird dancing during others' solos — it's all there.

Valley Jazz

Monk lived inside his own, unique musical world, even when offstage. One scene shows him doing his dance, not during a performance but in the middle of an English airport concourse (to the obvious bemusement of the onlookers!).

His astounding rhythmic and melodic sense may seem haphazard to the uninitiated. It seems even more so as we watch him translate it to the keyboard, until he plays a complex passage with his band perfectly, thus proving that he does indeed "know what he's doing." John Coltrane, who played with Monk in the late 1950s, called him "a musical architect of the highest order."

The film does show vividly what a fascinating character Monk was, and that brings me to the bad news. In fact, he was a reclusive, mentally disturbed man, subject to long fits of depressed withdrawal and needing occasional hospital stays. The problem is that the film dwells on this, rather than on his incredible musical contributions, letting his music speak for itself (did we really need to see him needing his wife's help getting dressed?). This is fine if you are already convinced of his genius, as I'm sure the filmmakers were, and possibly acceptable considering that the film was intended for a specialized audience. But it does little for his reputation among the general public.

Monk's name may not be a household word, but the publicity he did receive during his lifetime (including a Time cover story) also concentrated on his personal quirks. The makers of this film failed to take the opportunity to right this wrong. Many people had similar complaints about Bird, which concentrated on Charlie Parker's drug and alcohol problems. Consider Amadeus as a counterexample: that film exposed Mozart as a precocious brat, yet gave equal time to his musical gift. But Mozart's reputation has been firmly established, while Monk's hasn't.

The makers of Straight, No Chaser were White while their subject was Black; whether this is relevant is not for me to judge, but the fact remains.

The Flaming Lips to burn up Hampshire with a smile

By BRYAN HOUSE
Collegian Correspondent

When one thinks of the Flaming Lips, the first things that come to mind are mushrooms — mind melting mushrooms. It's like America and apple pie, Bon Jovi and girls in spandex pants — some things are just made for each other.

Fortunately for us, the Lips are playing at Hampshire College SAGA dining commons Friday night at 9:30 p.m. with Steel Pole Bath Tub, a great up-and-coming Boston band. Admission is $5.

When the Lips played Sheehan's two years ago, they were so loud they blew the power on the entire block. There was a fire in the club, and they ended up playing the last hour lit only with strobe lights. They even did an acoustic tribute to Andy Gibb, in honor for his death that week, while waiting for power. Those who went say it was a religious experience.

PREVIEW

The Flaming Lips are a psychedelic power trio from Oklahoma whose most recent album, Telepathic Surgery, came out earlier this year. Their songs build fron simple riffs into a fury of white noise. They are well known for such classics as "Jesus Shooting Heroin," "One Million, Billionth of a Milli-Second on a Sunday Morning," "Everything's Exploding," "Hari-Krishna Stomp Wagon (Fuck Led Zeppelin)," and "Charlie Manson Blues."

However, what the Flaming Lips are most recognized for is their insane obsession with eyeballs. Their management company is called Bulging Eye, their last album has a picture of a hand holding a bloody eyeball over a sink, and Here It Is has a huge close-up of the drummer's eyeball on the back cover, with numerous eyeballs splattered all over the lyric sheet.

On the Oh My Gawd . . . The Flaming Lips album cover, on which there is a photo montage of wild pictures and caricatures of brain meltdown on the outside of the gatefold cover, while on the inside are the lyrics in lime green, superimposed on a pil of vomit. Wild stuff.

Another Morrissey brings his voice to town

By AL KAUFMAN
Collegian Staff

PREVIEW

There's another Morrissey in town. He doesn't mope and whine, and he has a first name. It's Bill.

Bill Morrissey has been called the Tom Waits of the Northeast. The singer/songwriter from New Hampshire has already built a following (Billheads) that rivals Deadheads on a devotional level. They travel with him to coffeehouses across the Northeast. They will stop at the Iron Horse tomorrow night.

As a songwriter, Morrissey has received rave reviews for his first two albums, North and Bill Morrissey. His distinct, gravelly voice sings his provocative, personal and often wickedly funny songs that cover topics such as the inability of BMW drivers to obey traffic laws ("Car and Driver"), an evening with a coked up preppy woman ("Grizzly Bear"), and why he's never going to get out of bed again ("It's Dangerous Out There").

His newest album Standing Eight, promises to make Morrissey as widely cherished by the masses as he is by the critics. His record company, Rounder, is in the midst of a massive promotional campaign, and Morrissey's good friend, Suzanne Vega, sings back-up on the album's first single, "Handsome Molly."

With Vega's name behind it, people will at least give the song a chance. And once they do, they will be enraptured by its elegant beauty and charm.

Another song on the album, "Love Song/New York 1982," featuring Shawn Colvin on harmonies, is one of the most biting, scathing songs of the year.

But his songs really come to life in his concerts. Morrissey has already wowed them at the Newport Folk Festival, and he even upstaged his friend Peter Case when he opened for him last week in the Iron Horse. Usually dressed in jeans and a button-down plaid shirt, Morrissey is a working man's singer.

Between songs, he talks of work, women, and whiskey. His dry, deadpan wit shines through often, especially in his story of teaching his dog to drive in the streets of Boston ("He was cutting cabbies off, giving people the paw - he didn't care").

"It's weird," he said. "People come to my shows and they request the introductions to songs rather than the songs themselves."

PREVIEW

Tonight is a special night for the Hatch. For the place that usually plays host to a bunch of talentless college kids that think they have a future as a rock and roll band will be graced with the presence of a true legend this evening.

Tonight, the Hatch features the rhythm and blues of James Montgomery.

Montgomery, a Detroit native, has survived the everchanging world of rock music and maintained a strong regional following for over a decade.

After moving to Boston, Montgomery attended Boston University and later started his own band. In the seventies, The James Montgomery Band toured extensively with dinosaur bands, such as the Allman Brothers, Lynyrd Skynyrd and Steve Miller.

The band released two albums and seemed on the brink of making it big, but internal conflicts proved too much and Montgomery broke out on his own, often collaborating with various guitarists and drummers.

Throughout his career, Montgomery has toured with the J. Geils Band and Bruce Springsteen. His music has evolved from a strict blues format to high energy, R & B laced rock 'n' roll. His performances typically include familiar cover tunes as well as original material.

One thing is sure, Montgomery will play a whole lotta' party-time rock with a bunch of hot grooves. His knockout performance at Twister's earlier in the year left the entire crowd in a sweat-soaked, euphoric state.

Tickets for the show are a paltry $2, and doors open at 8 p.m. Get there early, as there are sure to be more people than than the tiny Hatch can hold.

Brubeck and boys boogie bigtime

By KATHERINE T. LAMOTHE
Collegian Staff

The Dave Brubeck Quartet
Fine Arts Center
Monday, Oct.2

For nearly 40 years, Dave Brubeck has brought fans a unique style, blending different rhythms and musical influences. Monday night's performance was no different.

Brubeck's use of different tempos and his combinations of sounds as exotic as Turkish folk music gave a vitality that really excited the audience.

REVIEW

On the first song of the night, a version of "St. Louis Blues," Brubeck framed the traditional blues sound with Latin influenced rumba music. Rumba was popular dance music of the 1940s and 50s, when Brubeck began his career.

Another interesting song, for a completely different reason, was "Cassandra." It had an otherworldly feel to it, with an echoing effect added to clarinetist Bill Smith's solo. "The solo is like Clarinet . . . from . . . Space," someone in the audience said.

The other members of the quartet, Jack Six on bass and Randy Jones on drums, were excellent as well. Six's solos, often at contrasting rhythms to Brubeck's and Jones's, were a rich backbone to the music. Jones, too, had his great moments, including a blistering ten minute drum barrage. Just thinking about how hard he was working made me exhausted.

But they all seemed to be enjoying themselves, especially Brubeck. He was constantly laughing and smiling with the band throughout the two-hour show. No sourpuss, this man. As the same person put it so eloquently, "He wasn't a Mr. Blah-Blah. He was a happy player."

Seriously, Brubeck was great. He didn't try to dominate the show with his piano solos; that's not his style. But his presence was there in the music, and he played with a lot of energy.

Some of the original Quartet's classics, such as "Take Five" and "Blue Rondo a la Turk," sounded a lot different with Smith's clarinet, rather than Paul Desmond's saxophone, leading the way. But the new versions were just as good, if not better, than the original songs.

The audience clearly enjoyed the Quartet's performance, giving the members several standing ovations. All in all, it was an evening to remember.

New Home Ec. computer lab to help all

By HEATHER M. RONOVECH
Collegian Correspondent

Where can a fashion marketing major go to write a paper for her junior year writing course? As of this Monday, that person can go to the microcomputer lab, located in the home economics department in 106 Skinner Hall.

The computer lab was created for the use of students, faculty, and staff affiliated with the department. However, those not affiliated with the department may also request to use the facilities inside.

The small lab includes six computers with dual floppy drives, three with hard disk, seven printers and a modem.

Although the lab was originally set up for word processing, software will be implemented for student projects and classwork within the programs of fashion marketing, consumer economics, family and community services and home economics education.

Dr. Penny Ralston, head of the department said, "Computer literacy is an essential part of the professional preparation for these students.

"We hope that this lab will be reciprocal," Ralston said. "If we as staff members help the students with their work, they will probably bring in new programs that we can learn about."

In addition, faculty members can utilize the computers for research projects. Dr. Barbara Schreier, an associate professor, got a faculty research grant for her project on the history of clothing.

Schreier said, "I needed a database, because a lot of information was coming in. The computer lab fills that need."

Sheila Mannen, a professor of consumer economics said, "With this lab, my students can do financial analysis, as well as work on family budgets for clients. It's a good experience for them."

The computer lab was funded through the University. A consultant, Bhavani Sitamaran, will be on hand for help in the lab.

The lab will be open from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m., Monday through Friday.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Tackle a difficult project before it throws you for a loss. You have the upper hand now and should keep it. A phone call from a loved one brings welcome news. Gamble on romance.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Join forces with mate and you will meet a financial deadline. A behind-the-scenes alliance pays big dividends. Check insurance coverage to make certain you have kept up with inflation.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Challenges make this an interesting day. Return all calls and catch up on business correspondence. Financial complications could mean trouble if you refuse to deal with them realistically.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Double-check everything connected with travel. Arrangements could get mixed up at the last minute. Savor a triumph without gloating or the tide could turn. Wave the olive branch.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Never mind about making big plans for the future; stick to projects already under way. The most promising ventures are those you feel in your heart are right. Romance is a roller coaster.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Changed financial circumstances call for a new strategy. A last-ditch romantic ploy works. Family could use some reassurance from you. Real estate proposals bear careful investigation.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): An attractive job opportunity appears. Do not fail to follow up. Friends lend their support. Innovative ideas help you get a foot in the door. Long-distance communications bring you good luck.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Get your act together early; others are depending on you. Business matters take precedence. Squash rumors before they gather steam. Your feelings about a relationship are soon clarified.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Everyone cooperates today, and the profits will show it. Abstain from gambling on speculative financial deals. Travel is best postponed. The folks at home need you. Polish your appearance.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Enlarge your sphere of influence. Make sure everything you do now will increase your knowledge and insight. A new friend makes an important introduction; it could change your life profoundly.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): A partner who carps may be bidding for your attention; give it. Friendships you make while traveling can be significant. Stick to a sensible budget. Save for a rainy day.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Do not be afraid to ask for a raise or favor. Cooperation abounds today. Making friends with an older person could lead to interesting complications. A blind date turns out super.

in less than one minute. UMass got one back on a McIver rocket shot before Yelensky made a pair of beautiful two-on-one break passes, setting up Scott Reed for both goals to create the final 16-10 score.

"Playing in Amherst is always tough for us," said Yarworth. "The guys tend to lose their concentration a lot. That's what happened tonight."

The UMass score card looked like this: Miller eight goals, McIver three goals, Reed three goals, Yelensky two goals.

Defensively, Koback stopped seven shots before giving way to Carl Johnson in the second half. After a rocky third period in which Amherst scored five times Johnson settled down and ended up with five saves.

Water polo notebook: The Minutemen travel to MIT to do battle this Friday. "They've got a couple of high school All-Stars from California," according to Yarworth. Stopping leading scorer Will Schnurr will be the key for UMass. "If we shut him down everything else should be fine," Yarworth said.

Trailing 1-0 at the half, the Wildcats stormed the UMass end briefly in the second half before the Reds put it away. Bringing sophomores Michele Woodside and Tracy Arwood and freshman Leanne Swartz off the bench changed the tempo of the game for UMass.

"That was a major factor," Rudy said.

Shortly thereafter, UMass picked up a big goal from junior defender Becky Bonzano. Kater set up the play with a cross into the box, and freshman forward Kim Eynard knocked the ball to Bonzano, who was overlapping. Bonzano nailed the shot into the far left corner past Wildcat goalie Jill Lewis (six saves) for her second goal in as many games.

The final goal came with eight minutes left as Szetela took a cross from Arwood and reversed it into the far corner of the net.

UMass outshot the Wildcats, 15-10 and also had a 4-1 edge iin corner kicks. Senior goalkeeper Mary Curtis made four saves in picking up the shutout.

DeAngelis blasted a shot past NU goaltender Brenda Mitchel for what seemed to be the go-ahead goal. Hixon disagreed with the call and let her sentiments known to the official.

"It legally went into the cage but the official said it was too high going into the circle," Hixon said.

The Minutewomen opened up the scoring in the game when DeAngelis knocked home her team-leading seventh goal of the year from the top of the circle past NU goalie Kathy Farley (who was yanked after the first half) with 3:37 left in the first half. Senior Bernie Martel and freshman Sherlan Cabralis assisted on the play.

UMass held on to the lead until Northeastern's Kathy Wilk walked in on Scott and tied the game up, 1-1, with 22:15 left in regulation. Wilk's goal was unassisted.

The remaining portion of regulation belonged to neither team as time ran out with the game still knotted at one.

That constituted overtime where both teams had its chances but could not gain an advantage in two overtimes. The Minutewomen had four shots and three penalty corners in the extra periods but came up short. The Huskies had three shots and two PCs.

It was the first tie of the season for UMass, 6-3-1. Northeastern is now 6-3-2. And though the score was equal, the result did more good for the Minutewomen.

"This gives us a big boost in terms of the ranking and in terms of New England," Hixon said.

NU had been ranked as the No. 2 team in the Northeast. UMass had been No. 4. But with the Minutewomen tying the Huskies at NU, those numbers should change.

Johnson fell, 7-5, 6-1.

With the match won, the doubles matches were reduced to eight-game pro sets. Johnson and Teitelbaum fell at first doubles, 8-3, but the final two teams each picked up victories. The tandem of Wadsworth and Audet rolled to an 8-2 win at second doubles, while Stone and Hechemy teamed up for an 8-5 win in the final match at third doubles.

defeated Marlene Kalinorski in straight sets, 6-2, 6-2. Yamasaki had to work a little harder to put her opponent away. She played well and took a close first set, 7-5. She then lost the second set, 4-6 but rallied back to win the tiebreaker, 6-4.

In doubles action, Girasella and Eddy teamed up to take on UConn's first pair. The duo played tough and won an impressive three-set victory, 6-7, 7-6, 7-6.

The other UMass doubles pairs didn't fare as well. Yamasaki and Kirchner played well but lost in three sets, 7-6, 2-7, 6-2. Foley and Ryan lost in straight sets, 6-4, 6-4.

"There's not much to say, they played great tennis and beat us," Gentzler said. "We played well, but obviously not well enough."

The Minutewomen look to get back on the winning track this afternoon. Springfield and UMass played twice last year, each team winning one match. Springfield is a Division II school, but its schedule consists of Division I schools like UMass.

"They are a good team, they usually win their conference," Gentzler said. "They play a funny schedule, so it's hard to say how good they are."

Minutemen fall to 2-7-1 on year after 3-2 loss

By ADRIENNE MATT
Collegian Staff

The kindest word that can be said of the play exhibited by the University of Massashusetts men's soccer team against Brown University on Upper Boyden yesterday afternoon, is "pathetic."

Head coach Jeff Gettler couldn't agree more, "It was a truly embarrassing performance. It was a humiliating experience. I am extremely disappointed."

The Bears of Brown defeated the Minutemen in a disappointing 3-2 effort. Neither emotion nor intelligence was seen from UMass throughout the match. Substitutions for UMass began early and there were many more adjustments to follow. Nothing seemed to work properly simply because no effort was made.

Although UMass outshot Brown 19-11, they never created dangerous chances. Fifteen minutes into regulation, a confident kick from 20 yards out brought the ball to the lower left corner of the net when Brown sophomore Steve Lacy scored his first goal of the season, assisted by senior Aaron Velli and junior Dave Donovan. The score remained 1-0, Brown, to the half.

Brown committed the most fouls (21) while UMass demonstrated their lack of emotion by only committing eight fouls. In a shoving match in the UMass box, Brown freshman Jonah Schiller was red-carded and expelled from the game. Within 10 minutes, UMass sophomore Brett Anthony scored assisted by junior Peter McEvoy. The goose egg was no longer representative of UMass, as the score was now 3-1. With 21 seconds left in regulation, UMass senior Louis Hollmeyer was fouled in the box. Sophomore Dan Lawrence took the direct kick and created a 3-2 score.

"Brown simply outworked us, outhustled us," said Gettler. "There wasn't one player today that did perform.

Women's soccer gets by UNH, 3-0

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

Maybe University of Massachusetts women's soccer coach Jim Rudy is on to something.

Sunday, Rudy switched to five defenders and watched as his team pumped home six goals, the most it has scored in two years, in a win over Holy Cross.

Yesterday, the Reds got a goal from a midfielder and two more from defenders in knocking off 19th-ranked New Hampshire, 3-0 in Durham, NH.

The win now gives UMass, 7-2-1, a modest seven-game unbeaten streak and spoiling a "homecoming" for Wildcat coach Margie Anderson and assistant Debbie Belkin, both UM grads.

"It was a very tough game," Rudy said. "They marked us very tight."

The Reds broke on top five minutes into it, as senior Colette Bowler served a corner kick into the box and junior midfielder April Kater finished it off for her team-high sixth score.

"Colette's got her corner kick form back," Rudy said.

UNH had a chance to tie when it appeared a penalty was going to be called against UMass, but a Wildcat penalty nullfied the call. It was one of many chances the Wildcats missed.

"They matched a penalty so the ref didn't give it," Rudy said. "They had three dangerous balls in the box and had a crack at it, but we scrambled away.

"With the penalty and the two or three balls they had, it could have been a different game," Rudy said. "They were very dangerous."

Rudy praised the play of defender Kim Montgomery, and also noted the job that senior Sarah Szetela did in stopping UNH's leading scorer, Diane McLaughlin, as well as freshman Holly Hellmuth on Mary Beth Sydlowski.

Water polo conquers Amherst, 16-10

By JOHN STEVEN MARPLE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts water polo team won the battle for town bragging rights by defeating their neighbors from Amherst College last night, 16-10 before close to 50 fans at the Amherst College pool.

Before two minutes had expired, the 19th-ranked Minutemen jumped to a 2-0 lead. Jon Miller scored the first goal and then Brian McIver took a nice outlet pass from goalie Pete Koback up the right wing for the score.

Amherst got on the board with 3:23 left in the period. That would be only goal the Lord Jeffs would get in the opening stanza as the quarter ended with UMass on top, 5-1.

The scoring slowed down in the second quarter as Miller and Alex Yelensky scored the only goals of the period to make it 7-1 at halftime.

"We dominated the first half," said UMass coach Russ Yarworth.

The second half was a different story however, as Amherst outplayed the Minutemen, jumping all over them for a 5-3 advantage in the third quarter to cut the UMass lead to 10-6.

"We let down in the second half," said Yarworth. "With a big lead that's understandable. They didn't concentrate as well in the final two periods. There was a lack of effort out there."

The Amherst assault continued in the last quarter as they came as close as three points, 13-10, with two goals

UMass wins, 1-1

Hixon happy to tie NU

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts field hockey team has won six of its first 10 games this season. But, yesterday's 1-1 tie with Northeastern University may have been the biggest victory of the year so far for the Minutewomen.

"We were outstanding," UMass coach Pam Hixon said. "I feel so much better about how we played as a team."

UMass went to Boston to play the No. 7 team in the country, a team that had beaten the Minutewomen in the second round of the NCAA tourney, on the Huskies home turf as the No. 12 team in the nation and convincingly dominated NU.

The telling statistic was shots inside the circle. Northeastern was able to get just one shot off in regulation inside the curve on UMass freshman goalie Phillipa Scott. By comparison, the Minutewomen unleashed 15 shots, four of which were from inside the circle. UMass' defense locked the Huskies out as Northeastern had to be content with 10 shots outside the circle in regulation.

"We decided we were going to lay back and play soft and let them bring the ball to us," Hixon said.

And when that happened, the Minutewomen intercepted the ball on a majority of occasions at the 50 or their own 40 yard-line to create their own opportunities. One of those almost won the game but a controversial call was made by the official.

As the waning minutes of the game were winding down, UMass set up for a penalty corner. Kathy

Midnight Madness coming in 9 days

Midnight Madness is coming to the Curry Hicks Cage, and you can be a part of it.

The first annual event, on Oct. 14 from 10:30 p.m. to 12:30 a.m. will officially kick off the 1989-90 University of Massachusetts men's basketball season. Live entertainment will be provided by WHMP-99.3 FM. Foul shooting, halfcourt shooting, and dunking contests will be held, and prizes such as a trip to Florida, dinner gift certificates and cash can be won.

"It's really something for the students," said head coach John Calipari. "We want everyone to come out and show their support for the team."

In conjunction with this event, the men's basketball team will be sponsoring a 3-on-3 basketball tournament, open to all UMass students. There will be separate divisions for men and women, and any student with a valid UMass ID can enter.

Sign-ups will be held tomorrow through Friday, as well as Monday and Tuesday all day in the basketball office (Note: this is a change in time and place).

The tournament will begin next Tuesday at 8 p.m in Boyden Gym and will continue Wednesday night. Finals in both divisions will be played during the Midnight Madness at the Cage.

Tennis teams split at Connecticut

• Minutemen take 7-2 win

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's tennis team continued its winning ways yesterday, taking a 7-2 match from the University of Connecticut at Storrs, Conn.

The win improves the Minutemen to 4-1 on the season. They will travel to the University of Hartford this afternoon for a 3 p.m. match.

UMass put the match away early by taking five of the six singles matches. Barry Wadsworth kept up his impressive string of performances, sweeping to a 6-0, 6-1 win at number one singles.

Paul Audet also swept to a 6-2, 6-3 win at second singles, likewise with freshman Jeff Hechemy at the third position, 6-4, 6-4.

The toughest of the singles wins belonged to freshman Lloyd Teitelbaum at number four. After winning the first set, 6-1, Teitelbaum dropped the second in a tiebreaker, 6-7 (7-3) before coming back to take the match with a 6-1 win in the final set.

The Minutemen officially wrapped up the match with Rich Stone's win at fifth singles, 7-5, 6-1. The Huskies got their only singles win at number six, as Minuteman Chris

• Women fall to Huskies

By C.J. ABATI
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's tennis team saw its winning streak end Tuesday as the University of Connecticut recorded an easy 6-3 win in Storrs, Conn.

UMass travels to Springfield College today for a 3 p.m. match.

"They were a tougher team than we were," UMass coach Edwin Gentzler said of UConn. "They usually come in near the top of the Big East, which is a tougher league."

The Minutewomen (2-3) dug a hole for themselves as the top three singles players lost their matches in straight sets. Maura Foley was defeated by Karen Ford, 6-3, 6-3. Both are their repsective teams' top singles players.

UConn's No. 2 Lisa Amato won her match, 6-1, 6-4 over Gal Girasella. Kere Eddy had her troubles as well, losing 6-1, 6-0 to UConn's Ellen Barrett.

Connecticut also pulled out a victory in the sixth singles spot. The Minutewomen's Vanessa Kirchner put up a good fight against her opponent, Cory Robinson, but lost the match in a third-set tiebreaker, 7-6, 5-7, 6-3.

The only UMass singles victories were by number four Amy Ryan and number five Shizuko Yamasaki. Ryan

'Critical' rally slated to fight budget cuts

At Statehouse Oct. 18

By NATHAN KRYSTALL
Collegian Staff

A "critical" rally and lobbying effort at the Statehouse to protest budget cutbacks to the University of Massachusetts has been scheduled for Oct. 18, said Student Trustee Eric Nakajima.

"It's a critical point in the battle with the state government and state legislature to get the resources we need to survive," Nakajima said. "Oct. 18 is setting the tone for the next 20 or 25 years."

Nakajima said the University's budget will be cut by up to $5 million if plan by L. Edward Lashman, the state secretary for Administration and Finance, goes into effect.

Lashman's plan would cut $35 million from the statewide 29 University system, said Tripp Jones, an aide to Lashman.

Jones said the rally will be "helpful" to the legislature by bringing students' concerns to the fore.

"It will give them the ability to focus on something that deserves considerable attention," Jones said.

Nakajima said further cuts of several million dollars are likely, accentuating the need for immediate student action.

"The administration's done a fairly good job of sheltering undergraduates from harm," Nakajima said. "But if we have to suffer another $4 million to $15 million cut this year, you'll see major changes."

Nakajima said he hopes that as many students as possible will participate in the rally and lobbying effort. He said appointments will be scheduled with state representatives to enable students to talk with their area representatives.

Many events, high hopes mark Fall Parents Day

By WENDY LATTUCA
Collegian Correspondent

Many questions are running through the minds of Brian Brebner and Valerie Falk, organizers of Fall Parents Day 1989.

Will the helium tank be delivered on time? Has the work crew for the tale and tent set-up been confirmed? What about the clean up crew?

Brebner and Falk are preparing for the upcoming event which will take place on Saturday, Oct. 7. They said it's hard to predict just how many people will come.

Last year invitations were sent to the parents of all University of Massachusetts undergraduates and 3,500 parents participated.

This year, however, because funding has been cut, the Campus Connection, a newsletter which informed parents of Parents Day, was only mailed to parents in New England. Organizers are expecting from 1,500 to 2,500 parents. But since Parents Day falls on Homecoming Weekend, attendance could be much greater, especially if the weather is good, Brebner said.

Parents are expected to arrive between 9 a.m. and 10 a.m. Saturday for coffee and doughnuts in the Fine Arts Center. Chancellor Joseph Duffey will open the day at 10 a.m. with welcoming remarks. Professor Frank Hugus from Germanic Languages and Literatures and Falk, assistant director of alumni relations will also speak at this time.

The opening will conclude with musical entertainment by Dr. Walter Chesnut, professor of music at UMass. Following the welcome, parents will be able to choose from 11 different courses, discussions, workshops and informal

Food Engineering department to be eliminated

By CHRIS MUTHER
Collegian Staff

The Food Engineering department under the College of Food and natural resources will be eliminated next year because of state budget constraints, Dr. Robert G. Helgesen, dean-designate of the college, said yesterday.

In an effort to comply with a $400,000 reduction slated for fiscal year 1991, Helgesen said he recommended to Provost Richard O'Brien last month that the department be eliminated.

This action marks the first time an entire department has been eliminated because of the current budget turmoil, Helgesen said.

In a forthcoming letter, the Provost's office will outline the details involved in phasing out the department, which last year contained 25 majors.

Helgesen said he recommended to O'Brien that the process be completed by June, 1990.

"I hope people realize the fiscal condition that has caused us to make this decision and are asking their legislators to be accountable for what's happening," Helgesen said.

> "I hope people realize the fiscal condition that has caused us to make this decision."
> – Dr. Robert G. Helgesen

Dr. Henry Schwartzberg, acting director of the Food Engineering department, said all professors in the department are tenured and therefore cannot be laid off by the University.

Because of this, he is devising a proposal to incorporate the faculty into another area within UMass.

"There is some sort of transfer plan for the faculty," he said.

Schwartzberg said he will be presenting a proposal today in which he will make suggestions for the future of the department.

"I think it's a worthwhile department and we're trying to evolve a means to incorporate it to help in another [department]," he said.

The primary goal of his proposal is to ensure that majors are able to graduate, most of which he noted are graduate students, he said.

He said the program will not be discontinued completely and is looking at ways to retain the department through other outlets that are available.

"We're looking at options that are available and that are compatible with the federal funding that we are still receiving," Schwartzberg said.

The head of the department, Dr. John Rosenau, is currently on sabbatical in Denmark, but is being updated on the situation via a facsimile, Schwartzberg said.

CAG election smooth even with problems

In spite of light to moderate voter turnout and lingering controversy over missing nomination papers, yesterday's Commuter Area Government elections went smoothly, said Election Coordinator Robert Higson.

Several governing board candidates, including Brian-James Crawford, objected to the election's timing, two days after the new Undergraduate Student Senate elections. "I'm fed up with elections," he said.

In the officers' elections, which featured one candidate for each position, Clarinda Rose-Turner was elected president with 54 votes.

Cory Schauer was elected vice president with 57 votes, and Howard McEachern was chosen as CAG treasurer with 45 votes.

The results of the Governing Board elections are as follows:

- Paul DelGallo – 40
- Christine Morton – 37
- Brian-James Crawford – 36
- Nathan Moore – 35

Vigil held for peace in Middle East

By DONALD McCULLOCH
Collegian Correspondent

NORTHAMPTON – About 50 people gathered in front of the Unitarian Society Tuesday night for an Israeli-Palestinian vigil held to encourage the groups to work toward achieving peace in the Middle East and throughout the world.

Participants, many of whom were draped in black clothing, held candles, distributed literature to passerbys, and carried placards calling for an independent Palestinian state.

The vigil was organized by the Jewish Women's Committee to End the Occupation and locally sponsored by the Middle East Peace Coalition. It is one of several peace demonstrations scheduled for throughout the United States and Israel during the "Days of Awe," between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur.

Fee increase may lower $ on concourse

By PAUL MORRIS
Collegian Staff

Bruce Ledoux, the Campus Center vending coordinator, told the Board of Governors last night that proposed selling fee increases by a University of Massachusetts administrator would force some students to stop selling their wares on the Campus Center Concourse.

Campus Center Director William Harris, who recently met with Ledoux, proposed raising vending rates for full and part-time students selling manufactured goods, and for vendors with no affiliation to UMass. The proposed increases are an attempt to discourage selling non-educational commercial products on the concourse, Harris said.

Ledoux brought a letter dated Sept. 27 from Auxiliary Services Director Ashoke Ganguli to BOG Chair Charlotte Cutter which read: "I am deeply concerned about the level of commercial vending done by groups using our current vending policy. It see??individuals are using our most prized real estate on the Amherst campus for personal gain rather than institutional enhancement."

The letter went on to say that a group should be formed to look at revamping current policies.

Harris said that the intent of the concourse vending program is to: help students pay education expenses, allow recognized student organizations to distribute information and raise funds and provide handmade and educational aids to the campus community.

Full-time students selling manufactured goods now pay $32 a day; part-time students selling manufactured items pay $45; vendors not affiliated with UMass, but sponsored by an RSO pay $60; and vendors with no connection to UMass pay $100.

Ledoux said that students and RSOs are given first priority for vending space and the remaining tables are filled with non-students.

If outside vendors weren't allowed on the concourse there would be empty tables," he said. "I'm looking out for the students interest and it is unfair to raise their fees."

Ledoux, Harris and a subcommittee of governors will meet Oct. 16 to discuss fee increases and policy changes which the BOG will vote on at a later date.

In other business: Jeff Glassman, the governor's program council coordinator, announced that comedian Richard Jeni will kick off the BOG sponsored comedy series Oct. 25 in the Campus Center Auditorium. Jeni appeared on "The Tonight Show" last Wednesday. Tickets will be $3.

The shows will be held Oct. 31, Nov. 7, Nov. 28, Dec. 5 and Dec. 12 at the Hatch. The BOG has replaced the Commuter Area Government as the program sponsor, he said.

Glassman also said he is working on creating an "under 21" club for the Bluewall Cafe — complete with mocktails, a disc jockey, dancing and flashing lights.

Prof.: U.S. states not exporting enough

Worked on report that says large foreign market untapped

By LISA SHAPIRO
Collegian Staff

Many if not all of the 50 states are not exporting to their fullest potential, Stephen P. Coelen, director of the Massachusetts Institute for Social and Economic Research, said yesterday.

MISER, a state data center operated in Thompson Hall by University of Massachusetts faculty members and students, recently released a report analyzing export declarations supplied by the Foreign Trade Division of the U.S. Bureau of Census.

Coelen, who is also a UMass professor of economics, said the report indicates a large untapped foreign trade market.

"I believe that in order for companies to be able to export, they need to know what foreign markets look like," he said.

"We don't have enough international experience. We've got to learn some foreign languages," Coelen said. European countries that are close together tend to know a lot more about each other, he said.

Although the United States currently has the smallest export deficit in the last five years, Massachusetts exports grew only 16 percent since last year as compared with the national figure of 27 percent for last year, Coelen said.

"We have a deficit in our trade account with the world, though it's closing a bit," he said.

Coelen said the state did not grow as fast as the nation, in part because of financial problems encountered by the computer industry.

Computers and industrial machinery, the state's largest export commodity group, grew only 12.7 percent last year, which is substantially below the 27 percent national export growth rate.

The growth rates of exports of instruments and electrical equipment, the next largest areas of trade, also lagged behind the national rates, he said.

Coelen said the leading importer of Massachusetts' goods changed last year from Canada to Japan, because the state's exports to Japan rose 40 percent in 1988, while those to Canada grew only 4 percent.

He said this data raises several questions including, "What have we not been able to maintain with Canada?"

The similarity of the Canadian and U.S. business cycles may have been a factor in the change, Coelen said.

Coelen cited a hypothetical example of the exporting of two U.S. products. He said if Canada had a particular need for one of the products, that growth rate would increase

Workshop held at Collegian

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

More than 100 Collegian staff members and members of the community attended a "voluntary administered workshop on racism" Wednesday in the Collegian newsroom.

The workshop, run by protesters who staged a sit-in at the newspaper Sept. 27, said the workshop was "a necessary first step" in education the Collegian staff, cited by protesters as allowing racist writing to appear repeatedly in the newspaper.

After the workshop, protesters and Collegian Managing Editor Cosmo Macero Jr. agreed to reschedule a board of editors meeting from Oct. 15 to Oct. 11. At that time the board will vote on three "reforms" the protesters have asked for — reforms they say will lead to a "more responsible Collegian."

- The resignation of Editor in Chief David R. Mark.
- The restoration of the Black Affairs Page.
- The creation of a page for Third World students, to be edited by a Third World student.

Mark said that should the board of editors approve his resignation, the Ex-

California book bannings give several UMass professors grief

By RONALD J. AGRELLA
Collegian Correspondent

Incidents of book banning and an attempt to withdraw Darwin's theory of evolution from textbooks in California have drawn the ire of several University of Massachusetts professors.

Karen List, a UMass journalism professor, said these attempts demonstrate an effort by fundamentalist groups in many communities to instill moral values in students nationwide.

"Many attempts [at censorship] are in high school," List said. "Young adults should . . . be diversified in ideas. These groups want to impose a value system on kids."

List said hundreds of such cases surface across the country each year and are steadily rising.

Books that have been banned in certain schools include: Grapes of Wrath, Of Mice and Men, Go Ask Alice, The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn, The Bible, the dictionary

"We're here to create a presence, not a disturbance," said Deborah Friedman, a member of the Middle East Peace Coalition.

Three Israeli women's peace groups, Women in Black, SHANI, and Women's Organization for Women Political Prisoners, joined MEPC in sponsoring the vigil.

MEPC is a local organization of American Jews and Palestinians that sponsors educational events and works toward peace in the Middle East.

For the past year and a half, the group has held events and worked to raise medical relief funds for victims of the uprising in Israel, the Gaza Strip, and the West Bank.

The Jewish Women's Committee to End the Occupation formed in solidarity with Women in Black, the Israeli women's peace group, and has been holding weekly peace vigils in Haifa, Tel Aviv, and Jerusalem, Israel.

Dalai Lama awarded 1989 Nobel prize

Award may help settle struggle with China

OSLO, Norway (AP) — The Dalai Lama, spiritual and temporal leader of Tibet whose title means Ocean of Mercy, won the 1989 Nobel Peace Prize yesterday for decades of non-violent struggle to free his country from China.

"My case is nothing special. I am a simple Buddhist monk — no more, no less," he said, adding he hoped the award would focus attention on compassion in every human being.

One clear purpose of the Norwegian Nobel committee was to deliver a message of support to the pro-democracy movement in China. The Beijing government called the award an insult and interference in its internal affairs.

Analysts also said the committee's action might eventually help break the deadlock between China, which has occupied the Himalayan nation since 1950, and the Dalai Lama, who leads an exile government based in India.

The prize, worth $469,000 at the current exchange rate, will be awarded in Oslo on Dec. 10.

In its citation, the Nobel committee mentioned the Dalai Lama's rejection of violence and his preachings of respect for all living things. it praised his "constructive and forward-looking proposals for the solution of international conflicts."

Past prizes have been used to encourage human rights activists and support peace efforts. Polish Solidarity leader Lech Walesa won in 1983; the 1987 prize went to President Oscar Arias of Costa Rica for his Central American peace plan; and U.N. peacekeeping forces were given last year's award.

The Dalai Lama, 54, was born Tenzin Gyatso. The son of a poor farmer, he was named spiritual and temporal ruler as the 14th Dalai Lama at age 15, just before the Chinese army marched into Tibet. He fled Tibet in 1959 after a failed uprising against Chinese rule.

In Los Angeles, where he was attending a conference, the Dalai Lama said: "I very much appreciate that kind of recognition about my beliefs. In fact, I always believed in love, compassion and a sense of universal respect. Every human being has that potential.

"This prize may open more people's eyes to look at their own quality," said the Buddhist leader, who wore sandals and traditional red-and-orange robes.

"Tibetans today are facing the real possibility of elimination as a people and a nation," he later told a news conference.

The Dalai Lama said he had no idea what he might do with the money and that he did not know the exact amount of the award.

"Do you know how much money?" he asked a reporter. "Some of my friends told me with this prize there was some money."

In the Himalayan town of Dharmsala, India, the base of the exile government, Tibetans danced and sang in the streets.

Despite the Dalai Lama's teachings of non-violence, bloody clashes with Chinese authorities have occurred in Lhasa, the Tibetan capital, over the past two years.

Security forces begin roundup

Arrests begin after failed coup

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Senate overwhelmingly approved a statutory ban on defacing the American flag after defeating a proposed revision that sponsors said could prove fatal in a future court test.

President Bush said he respected the action but would continue to push for a constitutional amendment.

The 91-9 final vote came after maneuvering by Senate Republicans, who say along with Bush that amending the Constitution rather than passing a simple statute is the only effective way to counter last June's Supreme Court decision throwing out a Texas flag-burning law.

The bill, which previously passed the House but now returns there for consideration of Senate changes, calls for up to a $1,000 fine and a year in jail for burning or otherwise defacing the flag. Both houses are to consider a proposed amendment to the Constitution later this month.

The Democrats say they have carefully worded their bill to protect it against an expected new court challenge on free-speech grounds.

At the White House, Bush called on Congress to approve the constitutional flag-desecration amendment he supports, despite the lopsided Senate vote.

"I respect the intention of those who voted for [a statutory ban]. But I continue to believe such an approach is inadequate in light of the Supreme Court decision," Bush said. "I believe that a constitutional amendment, properly drawn, is necessary, in order to provide proper protection."

Before final passage Thursday, the Senate voted 53-47 to table, or kill, an amendment offered by Minority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., to apply the defacement ban only to those who acted in public.

Ban on burning flag approved

Bush to fight for amendment

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Senate overwhelmingly approved a statutory ban on defacing the American flag after defeating a proposed revision that sponsors said could prove fatal in a future court test.

President Bush said he respected the action but would continue to push for a constitutional amendment.

The 91-9 final vote came after maneuvering by Senate Republicans, who say along with Bush that amending the Constitution rather than passing a simple statute is the only effective way to counter last June's Supreme Court decision throwing out a Texas flag-burning law.

The bill, which previously passed the House but now returns there for consideration of Senate changes, calls for up to a $1,000 fine and a year in jail for burning or otherwise defacing the flag. Both houses are to consider a proposed amendment to the Constitution later this month.

The Democrats say they have carefully worded their bill to protect it against an expected new court challenge on free-speech grounds.

At the White House, Bush called on Congress to approve the constitutional flag-desecration amendment he supports, despite the lopsided Senate vote.

"I respect the intention of those who voted for [a statutory ban]. But I continue to believe such an approach is inadequate in light of the Supreme Court decision," Bush said. "I believe that a constitutional amendment, properly drawn, is necessary, in order to provide proper protection."

Before final passage Thursday, the Senate voted 53-47 to table, or kill, an amendment offered by Minority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., to apply the defacement ban only to those who acted in public.

It accepted, however, an amendment from Sen. Pete Wilson, R-Calif., to make it illegal to "physically defile" the flag.

"The Dole amendment was the potential killer amendment," said Sen. Joseph R. Biden, D-Del.

KICKED IN THE REAR — A striking Boeing worker kicks at a car that drove too fast through a strike line on Wednesday, the first day of a machinists' walkout for higher wages that involves some 57,000 workers, with about 43,000 of them in the Puget Sound, Wash., area.

Tufts ends speech-limiting policy; Student president sad to see rule go

MEDFORD (AP) — Free speech for outspoken racists, sexists and those who don't like homosexuals has returned to the campus of Tufts University after President Jean Mayer decided a ban on verbal attacks, including offensive T-shirts, wouldn't wash in court.

"I have decided we are better off erring in the tradition of free speech," Tufts President Jean Mayer said yesterday in an interview.

"We decided we would decided each case on its merits."

The student body president, Billy Jacobson, a 20-year-old senior from Roslyn, N.Y., said he was sorry to see abolition of a policy supported by most of the 7,000 students at the private school about six miles north of Boston.

"It was well-intended," Jacobson said. "The university has a responsibility to protect students. It can't insulate students, but this is their home and students shouldn't have to worry about going into their dining halls and seeing something offensive to them."

The policy published in the student handbook barred verbal attacks, whether spoken or written, against an individual race, ethnic group, religion or sexual orientation.

The policy was prompted by an outcry last spring when an enterprising student marketed a T-shirt stating 15 reasons "Why Beer is Better than Women at Tufts." All disparaging women, one of the more printable reasons was "Hangovers go away."

The T-shirt dealer was placed on probation and ordered to do 50 hours of community service. But Mayer suspended that sentence when lawyers advised him it was unconstitutional.

B1-B bomber lands after emergency

EDWARDS AIR FORCE BASE, Calif. (AP) — A crippled B-1B bomber refueled over Texas and flew halfway across the continent Wednesday for a successful emergency landing on the dry lake bed where the space shuttle lands.

The $80 million aircraft, it four-member crew unable to unlock its nose landing gear, touched down on the 65-square-mile Rogers Dry Lake at 6:15 p.m., raising a plume of dusts in its wake.

Just before touching down the pilot said, "It's been a great day for flying, except for a few glitches," Punter reported.

Just after the landing, Punter said he heard the pilot say, "It was real nice. Structure looking good."

During the landing, the massive bomber skidded on its nose for more than half a minute, yet it did not break up. No flames were seen.

"It's one of the safest areas to land," said Spiegelberg, adding that the hard clay surface means there are no sparks and minimizes the chance of explosion or fire.

The aircraft, flying out of Dyess Air Force Base in Texas, wasn't carrying bombs. "There are no nuclear weapons," said Lt. Anu Sjaardema, an Edwards public affairs spokeswoman.

Jury: Ramirez to die by gas chamber

LOS ANGELES (AP) — A jury recommended Wednesday that convicted "Night Stalker" Richard Ramirez die in the gas chamber, and the devil-worshiping serial killer snarled: "Big deal, death comes with the territory, see you in Disneyland."

Ramirez, dressed in black shirt and black pants, rocked in his chair and peered around at courtroom spectators seated behind him as Superior court Judge Michael A. Tynan read aloud the jury's recommendations, count by count.

Jurors found Ramirez deserved the death penalty on 19 special circumstances attached to felony convictions that included multiple murders, burglary and sex crimes.

State law requires a separate jury finding of special circumstances before the death penalty can be imposed. As of Oct. 2, there were 65 inmates on death row in California.

Tynan will consider the jury's recommendations before he formally sentences Ramirez on Nov. 7. The facts of the case, however, made it unlikely the judge would reduce the sentence to life in prison without the possibility of parole, the only other possible sentence.

Bush will undergo surgery on finger

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Bush will undergo surgery to remove a cyst from the middle finger of his right hand, the White House said yesterday. Bush vowed to keep working in spite of "this awesome burden."

The president, making light of the minor surgery, said there was no need to make "a federal case out of it." Asked to raise the finger for a photo, he replied, "Don't tempt me."

Presidential spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said Bush would undergo the procedure — expected to take about an hour — on Friday at Walter Reed Army Medical Center.

The cyst, on the end of his finger just below the nail, has troubled the president for about three years. "It simply has reached the point where it has gotten larger and noticeable," Fitzwater said.

He said the cutbacks have already had severe effects on the University's library, maintenance and other services, such as the Escort Service.

This year also saw 957 class sections cancelled, an increase in class size and a reduction of 900 first-year students.

The number of teaching assistants and faculty already decreased considerably, said Nakajima, adding that 30 faculty members have been lost through attrition. The hiring freeze at the University does not allow vacant positions to be filled.

At the same time, tuition has been increased and less financial aid is available to students, Nakajima said. Tuition is likely to undergo further increases and programs and departments will suffer more cuts, he said.

Budgets for The University Without Walls program and the Labor Relations and Research Center were slashed and the Basic Math Program and the Department of Food Engineering were eliminated this semester.

He also said it is important for students to write their representatives, hometown newspapers and parents, impressing upon them the situation the University is faced with.

book ban

and many others.

School boards ban books because they feel the content is offensive for racial, sexual, religious and political reasons.

In many such occurrences, those who support censorship are not clear on what they are attempting to censor, List said.

"In the majority of censorship attempts, people have not even read these books," List said. "It's not just book censorship, it's magazines, plays, and even certain student speeches."

J.D. Salinger's 1951 novel The Catcher in the Rye was recently banned by the Boron, Calif., school board.

The Associated Press reported that religious activist Patty Salazar, who did not read the book, said the novel: "uses the Lord's name in vain 200 times."

"That's enough reason to ban it right there," Salazar said. "They say it describes reality. I say let's back up from reality. Let's go backwards. Let's go back to when we didn't have an immoral society."

List said communication is the best way to prevent all forms of censorship. "We need more informed discussion that the people banning books haven't even read them," she said.

In addition to book banning, a popular attempt at replacing the evolutionist theory with creationist in California public schools has gained much attention.

"Americans have a deep sense of fair play, about half favor the theory of creation in schools and half don't," said Dr. David Klingener, professor of zoology at UMass. "I'm not saying creationist theory is wrong, but don't call it science and don't pass laws saying we have to teach it."

Yikes!!! It's Gary Larson

By AL KAUFMAN
Collegian Staff

Gary Larson is a sick man; a very, very sick man. For the past ten years, this man's therapy has been creating, disturbing, hilarious cartoons to the ecstasy of millions.

In his latest collection, "The PreHistory of The Far Side," (1989, Andrews and McMeel, $12.95) Larson gives the reader a lot more than just a bunch of recycled cartoons. He lets one travel inside his mind, (a frightening place to be) and gives the reader a behind-the-scenes look at what goes into making the best comic strip in newspapers today.

Larson begins with a funny spread of his childhood crayon drawings. Here, he demonstrates how his parents grossly mistreated him (his father dangled him over the crocodiles at the zoo). Out of these occurances, the mind of this demented genius was molded.

He then digs out some of his early pre-Far Side cartoons, which includes some real sickies, such as an old, blind man standing on a corner, holding out a cup, and wearing a sign that says, "Roses are red/Violets are blue/That's what they tell me/Because I'm blind."

Larson then enlightens the reader onto how a struggling cartoonist making $15 per drawing managed to become the syndicated giant he is today. He even remarks that Chronicle Features, not Larson, created the name "The Far Side." ("They could have called it 'Revenge of the Zucchini People' for all I cared.")

The bulk of this huge anthology is Far Side cartoons. But wait, this is still Gary Larson. And although the man is soft-spoken and normally doesn't like to talk about his craft, he can't seem to shut up in this book. Many of the cartoons come with "explanations." Larson also provides rough draft sketches to demonstrate how his ideas evolve. Often times, these explanations and sketches are funnier than the finished product.

Larson is a magician explaining how he does his tricks. There's an entire section devoted to very strange sketch drawings. His comments are blunt and truthful. He says when he believes one of his ideas didn't work. Through his words, the reader realizes that more than one person was baffled by many of his cartoons.

But the best part of the book is the section titled "Mutations," which includes mistakes, reader responses, and the ever cherished rejected cartoons. In one page, Larson showed the results when the Dayton Daily News accidentally switched his caption with that of "Dennis the Menace." Dennis turns out to be a rather demonic character complaining about hamster sandwiches.

The rejected cartoons are the sickest, most riotous things in the book. Yes, they're disturbing, and some are just downright classless. But Larson has always been one for shock value, and many of these cartoons make the reader think. The first time one has eggs after reading Larson's book, it will be hard to forget the scene of two birds sitting down at the breakfast table eating scrambled babies.

Author discusses real-life drama and a title 'that came from a dream'

By HILLEL ITALIE
The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Money matters to Terry McMillan. But the author doesn't yearn for luxury hotels or billion-dollar deals, just simple things — a nice apartment or a good movie.

The characters in her second novel, "Disappearing Acts," (1989, Viking, $18.95) think a lot about money, too. Franklin works off and on as a construction worker. Zora is a school teacher dreaming of making it as a singer and songwriter.

They're two warm, intelligent people living in Brooklyn who meet by accident and fall in love. But if savings are low, luck matters, and Franklin and Zora are nearly destroyed by events they're incapable of controlling.

"She loves Franklin," McMillan said. "That's the whole point of the story. How much is enough? How much do you give before you say, 'I can't do this anymore'?"

"It's like real life," she said. "Every relationship starts out great and then reality sets in and there are things you have to deal with. A lot of it boils down to how much of an investment you're willing to make in order to make a marriage, or whatever, work."

The novel is a tapestry of exits and entrances, disappearances and reappearances. Franklin's moods fluctuate like the Dow Jones average, ranging from playfulness to self-pity and violence. Zora, hiding a case of epilepsy she fears will drive her man away, juggles career and family, finding release in music, friends and the son conceived with Franklin.

"The title of the book came to me in a dream," McMillan said. "I was in Brooklyn and I knew I wanted to tell the story about what can happen between a man and a woman when they fall in love and all these other things happen."

"I was in a similar situation where I couldn't believe I had arrived at this point. I stopped seeing my friends, I stopped going to certain places because he wasn't interested. I just disappeared. I went to sleep and when I woke up that morning, I said, 'Disappearing Acts.'"

McMillan lets Franklin and Zora tell their own stories, trading chapters between the two.

Much of McMillan's childhood can be traced by reading her first novel, "Mama." She grew up in a poor section of Point Haven, Mich., but escaped to the sunshine and promise of California as a teen-ager in the late 1960s. A love affair at 18 inspired her to write poetry, and soon McMillan was writing vignettes.

She attended the University of California at Berkeley, joining a fiction workshop run by novelist and poet Ishmael Reed, who encouraged McMillan to tap her writing talents.

"It was so easy, so gratifying," said McMillan, who now lives in Tucson, Ariz. "Not to say I actually wrote and finished real stories, but the whole thing was emerging and it was just wonderful."

Vignettes soon gave way to short stories and one short story gave way to "Mama," published in 1985. McMillan needed just two weeks to write the book's first draft and another two weeks to complete the second.

"'Mama' was autobiographical and so is 'Disappearing Acts.' When I say autobiographical, I mean being able to relate and identify with things that I have witnessed, seen, observed or experienced or a combination of all of them."

Mini-reviews of recent publications

• Non-fiction books

The Living City, by Roberta Brandes Gratz. Simon and Schuster. 414 pages. $21.95.

Gratz, a 15-year veteran of the New York Post, attacks the mistakes made by state and federal bureaucracy against the little people in this fine work on communities struggling to survive.

The author highlights the work of several communities — including Savannah, Ga., Ithaca, N.Y. and the South Bronx — in which people realized that restoration, not removal of buildings is the best way to revitalize their neighborhoods.

Gratz, however, does not allow herself to be swept into a frenzy, instead calmly writing vignettes on changing communities. Her style is more becoming of the New York Times Magazine rather than the Post.

Pearls of Childhood, by Vera Gissing. St. Martin's Press. 176 pages. $16.95.

"Pearls of Childhood" is a soft-spoken book that presents a different side to World War II: those who escaped the Nazis' wrath but whose families were exterminated. It is a sad book written with the innocence of a young girl in an adopted land.

Dave Barry Slept Here, by Dave Barry. Random House. 178 pages. $15.95.

At first glance, Barry's work looks like a history professor's worst nightmare. It looks the same at second glance.

Barry, a columnist for the Miami Herald, provides his version of history, in which every point in history (minus the dull parts) is presented with enough malapropisms and anachronisms to provide belly laughs for even the most humorless readers.

Jacob the Baker: Gentle Wisdom for a Complicated World, by Noah benShea. Villard Books. 113 pages. $12.95.

According to the book jacket, the author took 18 years to finish his work. I don't know if anything is worth 18 years' wait, but "Jacob the Baker" is a fine work, not necessarily as a story, but instead as a set of thoughts the reader can consider in a "complicated world."

ecutive Board would then have to also approve the resignation, in keeping with the Collegian constitution. The next regularly-scheduled executive board meeting is Oct. 12.

Pratip Dastidar, one of the protesters who ran the workshop, showed several stories published in the Collegian during the past four semesters.

"These are examples of how the Collegian has been insensitive," he said of the articles. Dastidar said Collegian writers were wrong to say "Palestinian" when they meant "Palestine Liberation Organization." Several other similar examples were given to further illustrate his point.

Several Collegian staff members asked whether what was called racism was instead poor word choice by writers. Protesters maintained the Collegian articles were racist.

Shouting matches occurred at times during the workshop — with members of the community applauding a protester's rebuttal of a Collegian staff member's question or explanation.

"I'm glad we had this workshop because its obvious we've made mistakes in the past," Mark said after the workshop. "It's unfortunate that several protesters did not want to listen to what staff members had to say, instead shouting them down."

Zairian president says Angola ceasefire soon

CAMBRIDGE (AP) — Zairian President Mobutu Sese Seko predicted a ceasefire in Angola by the end of the month and called for greater U.S. assistance in reducing Africa's foreign debt during a speech here yesterday.

Speaking at Harvard University, Mobutu defended his country's human rights record as he fielded hostile questions from a crowd of about 150 people.

About 500 demonstrators opposed to Mobutu's appearance at the university chanted outside the auditorium while inside the African leader was predicting a new ceasefire agreement would be signed in Angola later this month to replace the faltering June accord between Angolan rebels and the Soviet backed government, who have been fighting for 14 years.

"The will to dialogue is still there," Mobutu said through an interpreter.

Mobutu argued that African's foreign debt was preventing economic development in the continent. Zaire owes an estimated $7 to $8 billion to overseas creditors.

Speaking of himself in the third person, Mobutu attributed reports of human rights violations in his country to "professional propagandists determined to ruin Mobutu's reputation."

During a question and answer period, Mobutu reacted angrily when criticized by a student who identified himself as a Zairian.

The student criticized Mobutu, who has been in power for nearly 24 years, for a state of continued poverty and starvation in Zaire.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted

People go way too far

Everybody is talking about conservation. Our natural resources are limited and we should recycle wastes, try not to use too much water, and do other things to preserve resources.

I'm all for conservation.

I never fail to walk the extra few feet to discard the empty Doritos bag in a trash barrel, save the empty beverage containers for recycling, not leave the faucet running while I'm not actually using water, etc.

Lisa Hamelin

However, there are certain individuals who take the concepts of conservation and saving money to levels that are outright foolish and unsavory.

Take, for example, the husband of my close friend, Diane.

They live in an apartment with their nine-month-old son, and Diane must bring their clothes to the laundromat.

Her husband refuses to let her wash his socks. He feels that they're saving money on extra washloads by not bringing his socks to the laundromat. He has pairs of socks that have been worn countless times without getting washed. These socks remain standing after he takes them off, and they reak havoc on one's sense of smell.

I can recall the time when I was going up the stairs to Diane's apartment this past July on one of those humid, 90-degree days.

Upon reaching the second floor stairwell, I was struck by a horrid, overwhelming, organic stench. Diane met me halfway down the stairs, and I said "What the hell have you got up there, a four week old corpse?"

"No," replied Diane, grinning sheepishly, "try Bill's socks."

I refused to go any further up those stairs.

Two summers ago, when we had little rain, people were told to avoid frivolous activities such as watering lawns and washing cars.

A man who worked with my friend, Steve, went a step further: he decided to save water by not taking any baths or showers during the period of drought.

As you can imagine, this man's social life became nonexistent during that long, hot, and dry summer.

His fellow employees stayed away from him within a radius of ten feet. (Remember the jail scene from Harry and the Hendersons?)

Finally, it got to the point where the boss, who was normally a polite and soft-spoken man, confronted this man and said "Do you realize that you reek? Take a ?! bath or I'll terminate you as an employee at this company!"

A person who I know was talking to a woman acquaintance who had her three-month-old baby with her.

The infant would not stop crying, and my acquaintance noticed that the baby smelled like he'd soiled his diapers.

"Maybe he'll stop crying if you change his diaper," suggested my friend to the frustrated mother.

"Oh, I changed his diaper four hours ago," replied the woman. "You see, I'm only changing his diaper twice a day now.

"I saw this report on the news saying that diapers can't be recycled and they're piling up in landfills at an alarming rate.

"I figure it'll help solve the problem if women don't change their kids' diapers so often."

That poor baby!

I'd hate to see what his buns must look like!

This woman's idea of solving the waste disposal problem does not amount to conservation at all. Rather, it's more a matter of child abuse.

We can all make an effort to conserve resources and save money, however, there is a limit to how we can tastefully conserve

Build the bridge to peace

I am a Jew and a Zionist. I have spent over two years in Israel, and am very angry over the polarization of the Palestinian/Israeli debate on campus.

I support the Palestinian struggle for a homeland, but I know I cannot support the way it is generally presented, which forces the issue to be black and white — either pro-Palestinian or pro-Israeli — no middle ground.

Aaron Silverman

I in no way want to justify Israel's actions in the occupied territories. It is a terrible situation that needs much attention and patience in hopes of a solution. But propagandizing and distorting an already a complex history and issue is not a way to peace. It is this that I object to, even if the cause is just. The methods can still be wrong.

One tactic that distorts is the name game. Calling me, or any Zionist, a Nazi and a racist removes the debate from issues to one of slogans and name calling. Most people hear the word "Zionism" without really understanding where it comes from. Zionism is a movement for Jewish nationalism. For over 2,000 years my people have prayed for the return to Israel, and Zionism is the modern incarnation of that belief. Its intent is not to oppress the Palestinians, nor encourage racism.

Comparing Israel to Nazi Germany is a great historical injustice. The Nazi party stood for racial superiority, and did not even consider the Jews human, rather, "untermenchen," or subhuman. There was no dissent in Nazi Germany, for any voice raised against the Fuehrer was silenced with a bullet. Daily in Israel, there are protests against the occupation. Soldier after soldier returns form the territories disgusted at what is happening, but uncertain about what to do for change. The Israeli government is not a racist regime, it does not build its system on racism, as does South Africa. There exists some racism in Israel, but not as governmental policy.

When someone compares the nationalistic oppression of one people to the attempted genocide of another, how can any person with educational integrity listen without being offended?

So how can we escape this name calling and talk about the issues? There is a very serious problem in the occupied territories, that of the nationalistic oppression of the Palestinian people. Unfortunately, history has handcuffed the Israelis and the Palestinians to a common land, and they struggle violently for it. The 4 million Jews in Israel have proved, by force when necessary, that they will not be moved. And the 1.5 million Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza are tired of living under occupation, be it British, Egyptian, Jordanian or Israeli. The Palestinians will not, and should not, be silenced.

I do not support the occupation, but I still love Israel. How can I exist in a polarized campus?

I implore pro-Palestinian activists to stop offending the Jews with unjustified names and distorted facts. And I ask Zionists to stop ignoring the Palestinian cause, as well as their history.

Let us see if we can begin to listen and understand each other. We have a common problem so let's try to build a bridge toward peace.

It is the student's prerogative

On Thursday Sept. 28 the Collegian printed an ad directed at student customers from John Gesualdi, the owner/operator of Domino's Pizza store that serves the Hadley/Amherst area.

Gesualdi called his ad a "Pro-life Pro-choice Fact Sheet," referring to a $50,000 donation made by Domino's Pizza founder, Tom Monaghan, to the Michigan Committee to End Tax Funded Abortion. Because of this donation, many pro-choice supporters have boycotted Domino's Pizza stores. Gesualdi calls this unfair because the donation was made with Monaghan's personal money and not with money made by Domino's.

Monahan is a rich businessman who is anti-abortion. Therefore no pro-choice person wants to support him. What he uses his Domino's Pizza profits for is irrelevant. Pro-choice supporters know he has used a significant amount of his money toward ending abortion right.

I don't feel that Gesualdi can separate the issue by naming two different sources of money. The fact is that the same one man owns all of it and he is anti-choice. In his ad, Gesualdi says that Domino's franchises "Have never been asked to agree with any ideological or political views." Domino's student customers also have the right to their own views. If pro-choice students see fit to boycott a business founded by a supporter of an anti-abortion committee, that is their prerogative.

Print the news properly, please

Why do you make it seem so difficult to report accurate campus news? When the SGA elections suffered from disorganization, you thought it was necessary to print two front page articles notifying the University. You forgot, however, to announce that the elections were going to take place. A week later you printed, "Elections for representation to the Undergraduate Student Senate . . . are scheduled to be held tomorrow." On the day of elections!

I choose to read your paper due to its convenience and local coverage. In reading it, however, I sometimes forget if it is fiction or reality. As an informed and concerned student, I urge you to double check facts before publication. Perhaps you could eventually eliminate your daily corrections section.

Perdition in Lebanon

On Saturday, what is left of the Lebanese parliament, last elected in 1972, met in Taif, Saudi Arabia for what is generally regarded as a "last chance" session.

The deputies are considering the Arab League plan for an end to the 14-year civil war.

Hussein Ibish

For the Muslims, the priority is a restructuring of the "confessional" or sectarian-based political structure that has come to endow the Maronite Christians with a disproportionate share of political power.

The Christians are more concerned with the removal of Syrian troops and influence from Lebanon.

When these goals and the others that have motivated the conflict at one time or other are weighed against the costs incurred, a simple truth is clear.

It has not been worth it.

For all of the horrific fighting, the Muslims have not improved their political condition or made the Christians more willing to compromise.

The Christian aim of driving out the Syrians has been shown to be impossible and foolhardy.

Their unwillingness to accede to a redistribution of political power has brought disaster to themselves and their nation.

In fact, no party to the war can claim even one iota of real success. Sheite, Sunni, Druze, Maronite, Palestinian, Syrian, Israeli, none can justly claim greater success than failure.

The suffering and carnage have made every side a loser.

The "bottom line" is that a continuation of the military conflict under any circumstances is unacceptable.

The aim of the Arab League plan and the Taif meeting is to somehow transform the military conflict into political dialogue.

Of course, this will not be easy. It will demand a degree of political maturity unprecedented in the Lebanese government history. As with many other civil conflicts a peaceful settlement will involve accepting a compromise that is unsatisfactory to all sides.

The choice is not between good and bad, a wise man has observed, it is between bad and worse.

It is now clearly in the self-interest of all Lebanese communities to abandon the military conflict.

One great obstacle is the fact that many of the militia leaders who would have to stop the actual fighting have achieved great personal political and financial aggrandizement through the war.

Any return to a political rather than a military Lebanese civil structure is likely to diminish their status and power.

Of course, to allow personal considerations on behalf of Lebanese leaders to block a settlement, or at least an effective cease-fire, would be the height of irresponsibility.

Alas, even if the leaders were to begin a dialogue, their effective control of the ordinary fighters is gravely in doubt.

Clearly Lebanon faces an enormous challenge should she choose peace. The nation must be physically rebuilt and the socio-political structure "recreated."

It is a task as daunting as any nation can face.

The alternative, however, is a continuation of a war that has ravaged a country, killed about 100,000 of it's people, and destroyed one of the world's great cities.

Without a compromise Lebanon's future, like it's recent past, will indeed be "hell and perdition."

Surely no political goal can be worth that.

Junkie sees no future for See No Evil

By JON DRUKMAN
Collegian Correspondent

People often stop by Junkie HQ and ask us: "Why are your reviews so damn positive?" And we say: "Get lost punk, yer breathin' all our oxygen." If we were to actually stop to answer these pests, we would tell them there are two basic reasons. The first reason is because we get to throw away the book on journalistic objectivity. You just can't be objective about music. Witness certain nameless friends of the Junkie who like Paula Abdul and New Kids On The Block. These cretins obviously shouldn't be suffered to live, but unfortunately the Constitution says we gotta tolerate them. The second reason is that we buy all the things we review with our own funds, and there's a good chance that if we're prepared to lay down some severe bread for these items, then we're gonna like them. That said, we can plunge ahead with a tape provided to us by a major label promotional machine. Friends, if you should see an album by a band called See No Evil, cover your eyes and run the other way. Never in all our days have we ever heard such drivel. The phrase "cliche-ridden" springs instantly to mind. "Revolting garbage" also suggests itself. At first we were prepared to give them the benefit of the doubt: maybe they just sounded a bit like your average college radio band that rips off REM and U2. Once lead vocalist (and we use the term loosely) Robin Salmon yelped out, "Yeah, to go on/ All you need is love," we were puking in the nearest dumpster. Then he kicked his "voice" into a higher register in a desperate stab at sounding impassioned, just like his hero Bono, and we passed out. We awoke a few minutes later, just in time to hear the second song "Edge of Darkness," which was virtually indistinguishable from the first one, although there was a synthesizer doing a very convincing violin impersonation a la the Cure.

We have nothing against Rem, the Cure, and U2. Indeed, they were all fine bands at one point. Sadly, musicians nowadays seem reluctant to leave behind these bands, and insist on rehashing their ideas over and over again. None of them ever match the originals. In interviews, members of New Order have expressed bitterness over the unwillingness of modern bands to forget their sounds as Joy Division. Why don't these people use it as a starting point, and take off in fresh new directions? Maybe they genuinely like it, maybe they just want to make money.

DISC JUNKIE

See No Evil have nothing new to say. When they sing "I'm awake now, I'm alive," it makes us wish they would just go right back to sleep.

On the other side of the coin, we have a band called Coldcut, who take the past and grind it into exotic new configurations. Their debut album is called What's That Noise?, and it has just been released domestically after a few months of import-only availability. This is the kind of album that really turns us here at the Junkie Offices on. Since Colcut consists of two British DJ's, they recruit singers whose voices are appropriate to each separate track they produce. It kicks off with what sounds deceptively like a simple pop song. Guest vocalist Lisa Stansfield sings a plain yet heartfelt: "People hold on, we've got to be strong." Not brilliantly original, we'll grant you, but she does a great job with it, and the production really shines. Just when you thing it's in danger of being a pure pop hit, they throw in some really weird curves.

The rest of the album is divided between dance tracks with lots of cutting, scratching and sampling, and vocal pieces. "My Telephone" owes a debt to Kraftwerk's "The Telephove Call," but one-ups its ancestor by tarting up the near-Tackhead groove with a soulful chorus of "I can't live without my telephone" — a thought we all have had at one time or another.

"Stop This Crazy Thing" features Junior Reid delivering an impassioned plea of "Governments tell you what to do, don't let them lie to you," while a sample of George Jetson shouts "Stop this crazy thing!" Juxtapositions like this pepper the album. The thoroughly modern dance cut "Beats an Pieces" gets its swing and swagger from the drum track from Led Zeppelin's "When The Levee Breaks" sped up a bit. Brilliant!

There's been a fair bit of preaching in this week's column folks, but sometimes an issue matters to us and we have to speak our mind on it. The abundance of

Multiband Pops showcases campus talents

By JIM COHEN
Collegian Correspondent

The Multiband Pops, which traditionally coincides with Homecoming weekend, will be playing its 15th annual concert Friday night at 8 p.m. in the Fine Arts Center.

Multiband Pops, a longtime favorite of alumnae and students alike, is a collection of musical groups combined for one performance.

The show will include performances by the Wind Ensemble 1, Symphony Band, UMass Marimbas, Percussion Ensemble, Jazz Ensemble 1, Chapel Jazz Ensemble, Vocal Jazz Marching Band, and the UMass Dancers.

Malcom W. Rowell, Jr., director of bands, will be conducting the Wind Ensemble and the Symphony Band as they perform Riegger's "Dance Rhythms" and Wagner's "Elsa's Procession to the Cathedral," respectively.

The UMass Marimbas are under the direction of Peter Tanner. They will "combine over 40 instruments of both pitched and non-pitched percussion." Their set will include Manuel de Falla's piano composition "Ritual Fire Dance," in a new setting for xylophone, five marimbas, and string bass.

The Percussion Ensemble, also directed by Peter Tanner, will combine over forty instruments of pitched and non-pitched percussion to present Nelhybel's "Rondo Impetuoso."

PREVIEW

For jazz fans, there will be performances by Jazz Ensemble 1, Chapel Jazz Ensemble 1, and Vocal Jazz. Scheduled performances will include Jeff Holmes' "Scrambler" and Vincent Youman's "Without a Song."

The UMass Dancers will perform "Jamming," a modern dance directed by Richard Jones.

Closing out the show will be the renowned UMass Marching Band, in which over three-hundred students will bring their enthusiastic brand of playing, performing highlights of this season's field music.

Multiband Pops marks the only inside venue performance by the marching band this year. This enclosure provides "a less visual impact," said alto saxophonist Paul Langedon.

Bass drummer Kevin McCabe agreed, and added the band "will be able to lock in more," which means they will be "a lot tighter and a lot louder." Both musicians suggested earplugs to preserve hearing.

Trumpeter Tony Lechner said Multiband Pops would give the marching band a chance to prove the "music can carry itself," without need for a drill.

Band director George Parks believes the decreased focus on the drill and its visual impact will allow the audience to understand "the depth of all the bands at the University," as well as the marching band.

Asked if there were any surprises in store for the audience this weekend, Parks replied, "Well, if I told you, it wouldn't be a surprise."

Parks said this would be a great opportunity for people to see the wide variety of campus bands. "There will be something there for everyone," he said.

Admission to the show is $2.50 for students and senior citizens, and $5 for the general public. Tickets are available through the Fine Arts Center box office. Proceeds will benefit the University Friends of Music Scholarship Fund.

Pinter's Old Times gives us nothing new at all

By JOHN PATRICK MUSULIN
Collegian Correspondent

Old Times falls short of it's cast and crew. What can you say about a solid production of a narrow and inconclusive play?

Playwrite Harold Pinter implies so much, that he doesn't say anything at all. What starts off as subtle and awkward, ends up unsatisfactory and ambiguous.

The plot has a great deal of promise. A long, lost friend comes to visit and stirs up some ugly skeletons in the closet. A menage a trois unravels, to the surprise of everyone, except the audience.

However, this potentially explosive situation is so amorphous and indecisive, it's only saving grace is some scattered humor that plays on the confusion and mystery of the love triangle.

This, is indeed unfortunate, because there was some fine acting and directing talent waiting to be utilized.

Director Mark Harrison skillfully developed the uncomfortable mood of the play through revealing glances and facial expressions, along with excruciating periods of silence. Unfortunately, due to the inherent lack of resolution or change in character, this situation never grows into something new or different; it stagnates.

Philip Farantino, Sara Lavenstein and Bonnie Rhoads soundly portrayed their British characters with believable accents and graceful movements. Their physical acting, specifically their facial expressions, added flavor and enhanced the comic effect of the dialogue.

Based on the merits of their performance, I hope to see the cast and crew in a future production of a better play.

Old Times plods along without producing any stimulating or cathartic drama.

If an occasional laugh is worth the price of admission to you, the play will remain at the Hallie Flanagan Studio Theater at Smith College through Oct. 7. Tickets are $2 for students, $4 for the general public.

Abel headed for Full Tilt success

By PRESTON FORMAN
Collegian Correspondent

"I always wanted to write, but like most people in the arts, I also had to make a living," said Robert Abel, author of the recently published Full Tilt Boogie.

Abel began the pursuit of his dream in the Master of Fine Arts program in English at UMass. "I was not sure if I had it to be a writer, but the program really helped me out and helped me decide to go into it," he said. "The writing program gave me all the support I could ever want."

Abel, writing at the time for Contact, a UMass publication, began writing full time in 1978, after receiving a grant from the National Endowment for the Arts. Since that time, he has published two novels and a collection of short stories.

"For people who want to write, don't take a job writing - or any creative activity like teaching - because you will burn yourself up," he said. "Writing for someone else, I'd get home and writing was the last thing I wanted to do."

The short stories that make up Full Tilt Boogie are a vast array of characters and stories, which can be a problem when trying to get published. "My editors say they don't know what to expect between the covers when they see a book from me," he said. "They say I'm unpredictable. I consider that a compliment."

The stories grow out of Abel's own preoccupations and obsessions. He said that issues start to occupy his time and thoughts, and with this he begins to craft a story. The stories often revolve around the central yet paradoxical themes of innocence and childhood and the quest of breaking out of the ordinary, of looking for trouble.

His characters are rich and carefully defined with novel like detail. The stories draw the reader in closely to examine the character's inner most thoughts and desires. In "Black Bear at Lake Ectasy," Abel's talent especially shines as he carefully exposes, through a complex flashback technique, the yuppie character Conrad.

Abel tries to write everyday, but like many writers he needs to feel an inspiration to write before he can. "I have to sort of trick myself into writing," he said. "There's something too self-conscious with being a writer. I can't just say to myself, 'Okay, I am going to sit down and write a story.'"

"There are some writers that need a certain amount of ritual to write like Wade Boggs needs to eat chicken before a game,"he explained. "I can write on the back stairs or anywhere with my notebook. I don't really need to have a ritual to write. I rarely sit down to my word-processor."

He credited his wife and Valerie Martin, a professor in the MFA program and the fiction editor for Lynx House Press which published Full Tilt Boogie, for his success. "She really helped me get this collection published by getting funds from the Massachusetts Council on the Arts and Humanities," he said. "It's very gratifying to see interest in my work."

Abel will be at the Goliard's Bookshop in Amherst on Oct. 6 from 5 p.m. to 7 p.m. to celebrate the publication of his book.

Rembrandt gets around with the help of modern science

NEW YORK (AP) — An artist said he felt like he was "painting on a global canvas" when he winged copies of a Rembrandt angel around the world via fax to mark the 320th anniversary of the master's death.

"It's kind of a spiritual dimension of computer technology combined with art," said Max Alexenberg, chairman of Pratt Institute's fine arts department. "These are Rembrandt images for the TV generation."

Alexenberg, on Wednesday dispatched the computer copy of the 350-year-old pen and ink drawing "Angel Announcing the Birth of Samson to Manoah" from AT&T InforQuest Center in New York — the city originally known as New Amsterdam — to the Rembrandt House in Amsterdam.

The first of 24 sections of the enlarged image arrived instantly at the Rembrandt House, where Alexenberg said he put a fax machine on Rembrandt's etching press this summer.

The Rembrandt House relayed the computer copy to the Israel Museum in Jerusalem, which was chosen because Biblical pictures were Rembrandt's major subject. From there, the drawing was sent to schools and museums as far away as Tokyo, Los Angeles, and back to New York.

Alexenberg said Rembrandt was something of a technology buff, using the latest equipment and technique then available.

"Rembrandt would have liked this," Alexenberg said.

Stone Roses showcase their paisleys.

Stone Roses confuse yesterday with today

By ELISSA HENDERSON
Collegian Correspondent

Stone Roses
Stone Roses
Silvertone

Hailing from Manchester, England, but in no way following in the footsteps of the Smiths, are the Stone Roses. With their debut album Stone Roses, they evoke a sound of the late '60s bound by the cadence of a post-modern era.

RECORD REVIEW

The band's debut reflects the members themselves — diverse. Each song suggests a different message, from "I Want to Be Adored," to "I Am the Resurrection."

Their ideas are fresh, but their sound clearly mimics that of another rock era. Guitarist John Squire clearly stated that one of the first bands to inspire them was the Beatles. "But the Sex Pistols were the first band we could actually go and see. They were the group that made us the group."

Their music definitely reflects this British impact. Each song sounds vaguely familiar, yet unpredictable. By imitating traditional pop songs, the band adds a lot of their own elements to separate, and even contrast their sound from other artists'. Squire explained that the band is made up of many different influences, anywhere from Sly and the Family Stone to reggae and acid house music. I don't know what band he's talking about, but in the end, the Stone Roses sound like a cross between the Beatles, the Rolling Stones, and Jimi Hendrix.

Silvertone Records released the Rose's first single last year in England, called "Elephant Stone." This was produced by John Leckie, known for his work with the Fall, the Woodentops, and Simple Minds.

The Roses musical audience is growing across England. At a recent concert at Manchester's Hacienda, they filled the 2,000 capacity hall with devout fans, but the Roses have bigger goals ahead. Becoming a radio name in America is one. Lead vocalist Ian Brown added, "Our wildest dream is to be so popular we'd have to turn people away from [New York's] Shea Stadium."

October's Multicolored Birthstone...OPAL

BELIEVE IT OR NOT, one scene in an 1829 bestseller by Sir Walter Scott, Anne of Geierstein, destroyed the European opal market for nearly 50 years. One of the book's characters, accused of being a demon, dies shortly after her mysterious, fiery opal loses all color when touched accidentally by a drop of holy water. Was the power woman really a demon and her opal some kind of infernal talisman? Or was she simply a victim of her — and, by implication, all opal's fragility? Readers took no chances and immediately stopped buying the gem. Within a matter of months, the market had crashed and opal prices were down at least 50%.

It took a remarkable find of black opal at Lightning Ridge in New South Whales, Australia, in 1877, to revive the market for this gem. Australia's spectacular new opals took the world by storm. Indeed, there have been almost no opals found in the last 50 years to match what came from Lightning Ridge in its late 19th and early 20th century heyday. No wonder dealers sometimes liken Lightning Ridge's significances to that of Kashmir for sapphire, a Himalayan source discovered around the same time that set the standard for sapphire in the same way Lightning Ridge did for opal.

See our large selection of Opals this month!

DVP brings names and prestige to campus

By PAMELA PERRAULT
Collegian Correspondent

About twice a month, you can expect another set of posters announcing a guest lecturer. The credit for this goes to DVP, the Distinguished Visitors Program. It has been arranging speakers for the University since the 1950s.

Virginia Hunt is presently the head chairperson for the organization. She and about 20 other members decide on who is to come.

Hunt explained, "We get the speakers in a variety of ways. People in the community might want to see a speaker. Also, someone may see a book, so we'll write to the author."

People also propose speakers, and the DVP committee debates their level of interest and worth. Hunt noted that DVP tries to, "choose people to educate the University."

Once a speaker is agreed upon, DVP and the speaker make a contract concerning hospitality, what he or she is speaking on, and the presentation. Money from the Student Activity Fee is used to pay the speaker. DVP also has a revenue from a trust fund that provides for the receptions and dinners for guests. The organization deals with a new budget every semester.

Hunt remarked that DVP uses, "A little money for various speakers, rather than a lot for one."

Occasional extra money is given by DVP to sponsor open proposals and help fund speakers for other organizations. Afrikam and DVP co-sponsored Louis Farrakhan, a speaker at UMass last spring that brought a great amount of controversy.

"It was a big deal because the honorarium was very large. Plus, the money used didn't represent all of the student population," Hunt recalled.

DVP's second guest this month is Kynaston McShine, curator at the Museum of Modern Arts, and director of Andy Warhol: A Retrospective. The speech will be held in the Campus Center Auditorium on Wednesday, Oct. 18, at 8 p.m.

November's guests include Robert Hastings, a UFO researcher and Christopher Childs, an environmental activist and representative of Greenpeace. Announcements of future speakers can be expected. DVP has an office in 415 of the Student Union, and holds regular meetings at 6 p.m. Tuesdays.

A Classic Homecoming.

seminars taught by some of the University's professors.

The organizers tried to set up a variety of programs which are sure to appeal to everyone, Falk said. "This University was founded for service of the community and we are here to serve the people of Massachusetts," she said.

Professor Jeff Sedwick of the political science department will lead an interesting course titled: "What it Cost the State to Have a Governor Run for President."

Professor Stephen Gehlbach of the Public Health Department will be examining the differences between superstition and analytic reasoning regarding problem solving for health reasons.

Or, parents can learn how to trim an oak tree.

Professor Harry Mosher from the Agriculture Department will conduct a tree management demonstration. He will be using the large oak tree in front of Munson Hall for the demonstration.

Lunch break will be between noon to 1:30 p.m. and tables and tents will be set up on Metawampe lawn. The Bluewall, the Hatch and the Coffee Shop will be open. Parents are also invited to bring their own picnic.

The afternoon is free time to attend one of the sporting events or to browse in Herter Gallery, visit the Hillel Open House or look at the exhibit of memorabilia pertaining to the UMass Band Program.

There are plenty of things to do, say Brebner and Falk, and hopes are high that the weekend will be a success.

Men's tennis streaks past Hartford

By CHRIS MIRACLE
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts men's tennis team defeated the University of Hartford 6-3 at Hartford yesterday, improving its record to 5-1.

In singles, No. 1 player Barry Wadsworth was victorious yet again, beating Hartford's Ken Giavara, 6-1, 6-4.

Paul Audet came up short in his match after winning the first set 6-0 but dropping the second set in a tiebreaker, 7-6, (7-2). Chris Johnson also lost his singles match to Greg Weiss in straight sets, 6-1, 6-2.

Jeff Hechemy went the distance, taking three sets to win over Andy Finn in a tiebreaker, 4-6, 6-4, 7-6, (7-5). Finishing out the singles, Lloyd Teitelbaum and Rich Stone were both victorious, 7-5, 6-4, and 6-1, 6-2, respectively, allowing UMass to take a 4-2 lead going into doubles.

The first doubles team of Johnson and Teitelbaum lost to Hartford's team of Giavara and Brahlen 6-3, 6-4, allowing UH to get back into the match with UMass still leading 4-3.

Sealing the win for the Minutemen, the second doubles team of Wadsworth and Audet won their match by beating Hartford's Weiss and Rick Lopez 6-1, 6-1. Number three doubles of Stone and Hechemy also won their match 6-3, 6-4.

UMass now can set its sights towards Sunday's match against the University of Vermont at 1 p.m. on the upper Boyden courts.

"Vermont is going to be gunning for us," Roberts said. "but we'll be ready."

women's tennis

In head-to-head competition, the Minutewomen and Central Connecticut played twice last year. The Owls won both matches, including a tough meet on the upper Boyden tennis courts by a 6-3 score.

Central Connecticut's Allicen Poole, the top singles player, will go against Maura Foley. Foley has been frustrated lately as she has yet to win a match.

Also in action for the Owls will be Kristy Plenker, Kathy Dobransky, and Kate Conconnan. UMass coach Edwin Gentzler will throw Gail Girasella, Kere Eddy and Amy Ryan to pull out a much needed victory. Shizuko Yamasaki and Venessa Kerchner will also have to play exceptionally well if the Minutewomen are going to win.

JIM'S JOURNAL

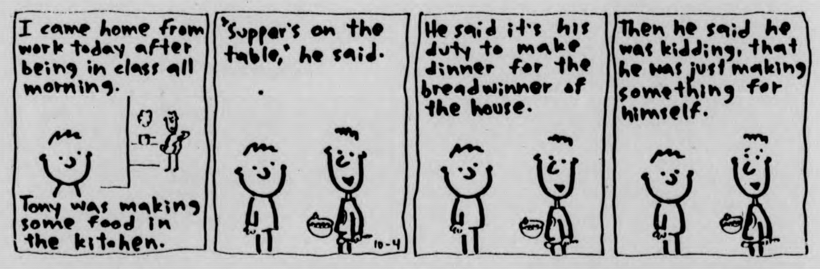
Today I was just sitting around watching TV
A really old movie was on. Cary Grant was in it.
Tony watched it for a while too.
We laughed at some parts of it.
Tony asked me how I liked working at the bookstore and I said it was okay.
10-3



I came home from work today after being in class all morning.
Tony was making some food in the kitchen.
"Supper's on the table," he said.
He said it's his duty to make dinner for the breadwinner of the house.
Then he said he was kidding, that he was just making something for himself.

As the guy with the beard and the ponytail said, the volleyball team is, "On the road again."

Coming off of its first victory of the season the University of Massachusetts volleyball (1-8) team is in West Virginia to take on the Mountaineers. Tonight's stop will be the first of a gruelling six game road trip that will find the Minutewomen criss-crossing the Northeast.

"West Virginia is good," said head coach Carol Ford. "It's not going to be an easy game."

The Mountaineers are good, very good. They are also coming off of two big wins against Rutgers and Temple. Leading the WVU attack will be Jennifer McCquen. McCquen leads the team in blocks, 60, and in hitting percentage (.220). Backing up McCquen is Michelle Domas, who leads the team in kills, 117, and digs, 199.

The Mountaineers (7-8) are supposed to be rebuilding, but it would appear that despite losing early in the season they have picked up on their weaknesses very quickly and gotten rid of many of them.

UMass will look to the same people who led them to their win against St. Bonaventure. Kelli Ramsey was a key ingredient, as UMass was forced to retreat from the 6-2 offense and go back to the 5-1. The 5-1 offense relies on just one setter, this means that Ramsey had to get to every second hit.

Another vital cog in the Minutewomen attack will be freshman Sharon Panoff. Pannoff's main trouble this season has been with the timing of the block. "Panoff has to learn when to go up." Ford said. "She's going to be a great blocker."

After tonight's game, UMass will travel to Pittsburgh. That in and of itself should be motivation enough to beat Duquesne and get out of there. The Dutchesess are in the midst of a dismal season (3-10) and even the sports information director, Nellie King, is having a hard time putting a happy face on the situation.

One of Duquesne's losses came at the hands of St. Bonaventure. The Bonnies beat up on the Dutchesess three games to none. "We can't take anybody lightly." said Ford. "We have to go into it and try to dominate."

The Minutewomen have their toughest part of the season coming up and must play the likes of Temple and Rutgers. And as coach Ford put it, "The kids have exams. We will have to cut back a little." The season has just begun.

Soccer to host Rhody

Today at 3:15 p.m. the Minutemen of Massachusetts will meet the Rams of Rhode Island on upper Boyden field. The University of Massachusetts men's soccer team is currently 2-6-1 for the season. From the looks of the play exhibited this weekend, there's no telling what to expect from the Minutemen.

The University of Rhode Island returned from New Jersey Tuesday with their tails between their legs. Rutgers whipped the Rams to a 4-0 shutout. URI began their season with a 2-0 loss to Central Connecticut. East Stroudsburg University held a tournament in which the Rams met nothing other than defeat. The game against ESU ended in a 2-1 double-overtime loss. Freshman Corey Sullivan scored unassisted. Against Lafayette College, senior captain Giainni Romeo scored unassisted, ringing in the only URI score of the 4-1 loss.

Against Providence College, the Rams met their first win of the season with a 3-2 final. Junior Tony Raulino scored unassisted. Romeo scored twice, once assisted by junior Rick Martinez and then assisted by Raulino. A 2-0 shutout against the University of Maine followed. A visit to the University of New Hampshire brought a 2-1 win in which Romeo assisted Sullivan and junior Pat Maguire (the Rams' goalie) assisted Romeo. (Figure that one out!)

Another double-overtime game ended in victory for the Rams as they shut out Boston College. Romeo assisted senior Pete Conover. Romeo continued his contribution to the team against the University of Connecticut as he assisted freshman David DeMello. It was the only goal for URI in a 3-1 loss. URI's last win was a 2-0 shutout against Temple University. Sullivan and Martinez each scored a goal for URI with Martinez picking up an assist on Sullivan's goal.

Romeo is currently the leading scorer for the Rams with four goals and two assists for the season. Sullivan is runner-up with three goals and three assists for this season. Maguire has started eight of nine games in the goal for URI and is averaging 9.5 saves per game.

"Romeo and Sullivan are dangerous," head coach Jeff Gettler said of the Rams.

The Rams (2-2, 1-1 in the Yankee Conference) are coming off an 18-13 non-league win against rown last Saturday. After beating Richmond (45-14) on opening day, Rhody defeated Delaware, 21-12, and then was squelched by a stingy Northeastern, 17-0.

"They've got a hard-nosed, tough defense, with a lot of seniors," Reid said. "Their offensive line is tough, and they knock you off the ball."

Reid is also leery of Ram tailback Chris Poirier, who he says will be healthy for the first time. Poirier, in three games, is averaging 8.7 yards per carry and has scored a pair of touchdowns. When he is off the field, sophomore John Newson (3.96 yards per carry) is more than capable of picking up the slack.

Leading the offense is senior quarterback Steve Monaco, who has completed 50 of 108 passes for 582 yards and three touchdowns. He has a pair of strong receivers in Jerry Williams (nine catches for 127 yards) and freshman Chris Pierce, who Reid says "have outstanding speed."

Defensively, the player to keep an eye on is junior cornerback Kevin Smith, who had a career in just 30 minutes against UMass last year. On a windy and rainy day in Kingston, R.I., Smith picked off UMass quarterback Dave Palazzi four times to set an NCAA record. Smith led the nation with 10 interceptions in 1988.

"Last year we were kind of obstinate," Reid said of UM's 26-7 win. "Even though it was windy and rainy we stayed with our game plan. A couple of balls were affected by the conditions."

The Rams haven't beaten UMass since 1985, back in the days when quarterback Tom Erhardt and tight end Brian Forster were tearing up the world. With last year's loss, Rhode Island fell behind in the series, now 31-30 and two ties, and would like to even that.

Then again, while the subject of reversing trends is on the table, UMass has won only once in the last 10 Homecoming games.

Should the Minutewomen engage in a shootout with the Owls, forwards Kathy DeAngelis (seven goals and one assist), Mara Frattasio (six goals) and Dawn Trumbauer with four goals and one assist will be the primary weapons. But the attack has been a question mark as of late.

"The one thing that's been consistent is our inability to be opportunistic around the goal," Hixon said. "Yesterday, we dominated Northeastern. Now I think we're starting to play stronger from our own defensive end out and not panicking so much so that we are moving the ball up the field. Again, I think our main nemesis is being able to produce the goals."

Temple goaltender Jill Marple has been very vulnerable this season. Marple has recorded 114 saves but has given up 22 goals in ten games.

"Unless something drastic happens, I would see Penn State, Temple and UMass being the top three teams [in the conference]. We can really help ourselves confidence wise and showing we can get the top wins by getting a victory over Temple.

Both are 6-3-1. UMass is 2-1 in the conference, its only loss to Penn State, 1-0. The Minutewomen will play another game on Sunday as they battle Maine at Totman Field (1 p.m.). Temple took on Penn State at its own field on Wednesday and tied the Nittany Lions, 3-3. There will be a difference in this contest though. Totman field is of grass not like the Owls' home field of artificial turf.

"Temple is very much of a turf team," Hixon said. "They're not fond of the grass. But I think they will come ready for it."

It is likely Catanzaro will anyway, and the Minutewomen will have to watch out for her.

"I do know for sure that if we don't stop her we're in trouble," Hixon said.

While Providence represents a chance for the Minutewomen to face some of the finest competition available, Connecticut and Brown are usually good programs which are experiencing down seasons.

Although Connecticut is weak overall, finishing sixth in the eight-team URI Invitational, it does have a top runner in senior Lisa Wakem (seventh individually at URI). "She can run with the best kids in New England — she'll probably try to go out with PC, and I'll look for our top kids to try to stay with her," LaFreniere said.

Brown finished seventh at the URI Invitational, and has been hurt by several top runners spending the semester in Europe. "Brown really doesn't seem to have anyone who can run with our top group," LaFreniere said.

One encouraging factor for the Minutewomen is the continued progress of sophomore Precious Hill, who is rounding into shape after a late decision to join the team. "Precious is really beginning to come on. For our first two meets, I held her back. In this race, I want her to go out hard from start to finish," LaFreniere said.

Today's meet will be a preview of things to come for UMass. "We're not aiming for Friday. I'm not going to back off of hard practices right up until the meet. We have to prepare to compete in the Atlantic 10 Championships and in the New Englands," LaFreniere said.

Another important meet is the Oct. 14 quad meet against Vermont, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island. "Our real aim is for next week's meet. It will be a big chance to test ourselves against Vermont," LaFreniere said.

Minutemen return to McGuirk for Homecoming

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

After spending the last three weekends on the road, this will truly be a Homecoming for the University of Massachusetts football team.

The last, and only time the Minutemen played at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium in 1989, they tied a highly-regarded James Madison University, 28-28 to hit the road filled with optimism.

But the team came out of the journey with only one win in three tries, and lost a few players in the process. Injuries could really change the face of tomorrow's Parents' Day and Homecoming game against the University of Rhode Island (1:30 p.m.).

The Minutemen seemed to pile up an uncharacteristic number of bumps and bruises last weekend in a 41-19 loss at Boston University. Part of the blame can be attributed to that good ol' invention, AstroConcrete (say what you may, but calling that stuff "turf" is a travesty).

"I think if we'd done our conditioning on tar instead of on soft ground," UMass coach Jim Reid said. "That might have had something to do with it."

But Reid shrugs off the injuries and says the Minutemen just have to move ahead.

"It's a war we have no control of," Reid said of the injury situation. "But as long as there are 11 guys who can play we're going to be out there. I hate to make excuses. Injuries shouldn't make a difference."

However, the fact remains that it might. With players like nose guard Joe Cullen (ankle), linebacker Matt Tulley (ankle), tight end Ron Villone (ankle) and defensive tackle John Creamer (knee) questionable and others like defensive tackle Steve Brothers (shoulder) and guard Paul Mayberry (knee) out for the season, there is a big turnover from the team Reid put on the field against James Madison.

Then again injuries are not the only pain in Reid's side. Turnovers have caused a lot of problems the last two weeks, especially interceptions, fumbles and blocked punts.

"At Maine [a 40-23 loss] interceptions ruined us," Reid said. "Five interceptions in the last two games. That comes out to about one in 10 passes thrown, and that's highly unacceptable."

Tailback Jerome Bledsoe fumbled three times last week, and UMass has also had four punts blocked in two games.

"After viewing the films, of the three phases of the game [the snap, the blocking and the punt], the two blocks on Saturday were 100 percent blocking," Reid said.

Blocking has also caused the offense to sputter. Quarterback Roger Baldacci hasn't had a lot of time to work in the pocket the last two weeks, causing his game to drop off. Reid was impressed with the play of sophomore Gary Wilkos in the late stages last week, and it's possible he'll see action tomorrow, but Reid isn't ready to push the panic button yet.

"We've been getting a lot of blitz. We have to block people," Reid said. "But if they blitz, we've got one-on-one coverage with the linebackers and secondary. We didn't block well for Roger."

Better blocking will also only help Bledsoe, who save for a 44-yard burst last week has had a pair of average games.

"What Maine and BU did was take Bledsoe away from the option," Reid said. He still would like to work the option game, whether it's Baldacci, Wilkos, or whoever, in charge.

Women's teams stay home for weekend games

• Stickers host Temple, Maine

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts defense has a special assignment tomorrow (1 p.m., Totman Field). It will be to stop Temple forward Jane Catanzaro.

Catanzaro has been a nightmare to opposing defenses. The Ambler, Pa., native has netted 19 goals and dished out five assists in ten games. The girl can just be unstoppable.

"She is very explosive, probably one of the most explosive players we'll play against all season long," UMass coach Pam Hixon said. She is extremely dangerous. When she gets the ball, she just goes."

And scores. The junior first-team All-American has stymied enemy backfields. Hixon is not pulling her hair out thinking what to do about the Temple forward but right now, she doesn't know who is going to draw the unenviable assignment.

"We really changed our lineup around a lot against Northeastern," Hixon said. "I really have to sit back and think about what we did in those positional changes and decide what's going to be best for us against Temple."

Catanzaro doesn't do it all by herself though. Monique Scally and Lori Warneka are often on the other end of the play. Warneka has five goals and seven assists.

"She [Scally] really distributes the play well," Hixon said. "Not a lot of speed but a good stick and really makes things happen. Those two kids I think are the real keys to Temple."

Catanzaro can be stopped or contained. North Carolina, West Chester, and Villanova all shut the forward out as far as scoring goals go.

What are the keys for UMass to stop those two though? The Minutewomen may start with junior centerback Kerri Fagan and freshman goaltender Phillipa Scott.

"Kerri Fagan has just been phenomenal back there," Hixon said. "She and Scotty work very, very, well together. We stopped the play above the 25 yard-line consistently [in the Northeastern game] which is so important on turf. I'm hesitant to break up that combination."

Scott has gave up just two goals in her last three appearances, both against teams that were ranked in the top 10 in the nation (Northeastern was No. 7 and Penn State is No. 4).

• Reds host Rudy's ex-team

By RICK SETO
Collegian Staff

When women's soccer coach Jim Rudy steps onto the field for the first game of the University of Massachusetts Classic, he'll almost be ecstatic to see a certain visiting opponent step onto Boyden Hill.

Mind you, Rudy is a nice guy, but he isn't this hospitable to every team that comes in and tries to take a match from him on his home field, but after all, this isn't just any team.

This is the school — the University of Central Florida — from which UMass managed to hire Rudy away from.

"This is shaping up to be an unbelievable game," said Rudy. "Their roster is loaded but the funny thing is, despite two people, all those players were recruited by me."

"I'm really going to enjoy seeing them and seeing them play, providing that everyone remembers it's still a game."

Central Florida travels north with a 5-1 record, with their only blemish being six-time national champion and current top dog North Carolina. In that early-season 1-0 setback, UCF gave up its only goal of the year. At the same rate, they are scoring at a 5.1 goals-per-game clip.

If there is one team that Rudy's got a good book on, it certainly has to be UCF. Their leading scorers are forwards Sandy Carter and Mauri Harris, with eight and five goals respectively.

Karen Richter is the last line of defense and Rudy is especially proud of the keeper, seeing how he beat North Carolina in a recruiting war for Richter. "She's a big girl who has pulled off some big-time saves," Rudy said.

Anti-climactic as it may seem after Saturday, the Reds will have to play another school from the Sunshine State — Florida International. That will pit Rudy against long-time friend and rival coach, Everton (Kumala) Edwards.

"Tactically, as a coach, his teams have always given mine problems," Rudy said. "He'll do different things like use a double sweeper and eight men back on defense."

"I imagine we'll see them dig in the trenches and fall back to try and close up the goal," Rudy said. "They'll let us knock on the door and try to catch us on a counterattack."

Minutewomen head to CCSU

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts women's cross country team will be facing both ends of the spectrum in their quad-meet at Connecticut today. In the high-rent district is Providence College, the top team in New England and national contender. UMass' other two opponents, Connecticut and Brown, are residing in the low-income district, at least for this season.

Providence College, coached by the Irishman Ray Treacy, is the class of New England and perhaps of the whole east coast this season. In the recent University of Rhode Island Invitational, against seven other New England teams, Providence took the top four places.

Coach Julie LaFreniere is approaching the meet with a sense of realistic optimism. "This meet is a chance to run against some of the top runners in the east. With PC, you could be looking at the top four kids in New England," she said. "I'm certainly looking forward to the race, and I know that the team is too."

UMass harriers search for fourth and fifth runners today in Storrs

UMass tunes up for championships

By JON REIDEL
Collegian Staff

Men's cross country coach Ken O'Brien hopes to be able to find the answer to a disturbing question this Friday at Storrs, Conn., when the Minutemen go up against the University of Connecticut and national power Providence College: What are the names of his fourth and fifth runners?

With a solid top three of Art Smith, Herb Heffner, and Jon Corso, O'Brien is hoping two more of his harriers will take the initiative and fill out his top five.

"We have a set top three," said O'Brien. "But we just haven't been consistent with our fourth and fifth men. There's a group of six or seven guys who are all capable of taking the next two spots, with Joe Livorsi and Mike Davis probably leading the way."

The Minutemen should have the edge over UConn going into the meet with Providence being the heavy pre-meet favorite. O'Brien, however, doesn't really see the meet as simply against UConn and Providence, but against themselves as well.

"This meet will be significant, because we haven't been able to do what we've wanted so far," said O'Brien. "Hopefully that will happen this weekend. With the championship meets coming up in only a short time these next two weeks will be very key."

This Friday's race will be the last of the "regular" season for the Minutemen. Next weekend will mark the beginning of the championship races with the Eastern Collegiate Championships, followed by the Atlantic 10, New England, and IC4A Championships each proceeding week.

With the Minutemen having last weekend off, O'Brien is banking on all of the extra training time as well as the noticeable physical improvement to pull his squad together in time for these bigger meets.

Perhaps the only ingredients that O'Brien has noticed missing are some intensity and all out gutsy performances.

"We need some reckless racing," said O'Brien. "Sort of like how a race car driver races when he's in search of a desperate win — he's not afraid of crashing."

Tennis takes on CCSU

By C.J. ABATI
Collegian Staff

The women's tennis team continues their season tomorrow afternoon with a match against Central Connecticut State University. The match takes place at 1 p.m. at the upper Boyden courts.

The Owls have been very successful in the past, winning the Seaboard Conference the last two years in a row. At present, they have a 7-1 record and seem to be headed to a third straight title. Central Connecticut is under the direction of head coach Victor Stone.

There have been two common opponents between the Minutewomen and the Owls this season, Hartford University and the University of Connecticut. The results spell trouble for UMass. Both teams defeated Hartford, but Connecticut was a different story. Central Connecticut beat UConn 5-4, whereas the Huskies defeated the Minutemen rather easily by a score of 6-3. Another strong team the Owls have beaten are the cadets from the United States Military Academy.

Students protest U.S. support of government in El Salvador

Protesters claim government is guilty of oppression

By NATHAN KRYSTALL
Collegian Staff

A rally protesting the United States government's support of the "death squad" government in El Salvador attracted a small crowd of students to the steps of the Student Union Building Friday.

According to rally speaker Glenn McGuigan, the United States has given $4 billion in aid to the El Salvadoran government since 1979. He said much of this money is used to repress Salvadorans who oppose their government.

"The U.S. must not and should not support death squads. U.S. aid must end now," said McGuigan, a University of Massachusetts student and a member of the Central American Solidarity Association (CASA).

McGuigan also made a connection between the budget cutbacks at UMass and aid to El Salvador, questioning the U.S. government's priorities.

"If we can't even support our own educational institutions, why are we sending $1.5 million every day to a government that is systematically exterminating its population," he said.

"Let's make education our main export, and not terrorism," McGuigan said.

Another speaker, Alisa Beaver, a representative of the Western New England Central American Solidarity Coalition, said some 70,000 Salvadorans have been murdered, thousands arrested and tortured and one million displaced as refugees since 1980.

Beaver said her organization supports UNADES, a grassroots organization formed in El Salvador to organize poor and disenfranchised Salvadorans to secure basic human needs and rights. UNADES was formed by the survivors of the 1986 earthquake which devastated the capital city, San Salvador.

Much of the international aid for the earthquake victims was lost through corruption or spent on the war against the FMLN, the rebels fighting against the El Salvadoran government, she said.

"Our goal is not only to help earthquake survivors provide themselves with desperately needed health care ... but also to support popular organizing in El Salvador, and demonstrate a positive alternative to the destructive policies of the U.S. government," she said.

Beaver said there will be a "Walk for Peace" in Springfield on Oct. 14 to raise money for a health clinic in El Salvador.

Tom Hotz, a UMass senior, read a poem stressing how U.S. government policy toward El Salvador perpetuates the extreme economic disparities between the few wealthy citizens and the impoverished majority.

Republican Club member Jim Black, who attended the rally, said he disagrees with the speakers and added that the U.S. government must support the El Salvadoran government. "We have an obligation to protect freedom and democracy in Central America," Black said.

McGuigan said he was disappointed with the low turnout at the rally. He said choosing Friday as the rally's date was "bad timing" because it marked the beginning of the long weekend.

The rally was organized by CASA, a student organization dedicated to educating the University community about Central America.

Water main break leaves residents high and dry

By PAUL MORRIS
Collegian Staff

So, the guy in class Friday smelled like a wet dog and you almost suffocated when the girl with yellowish breath behind you wouldn't stop talking.

Maybe they were two of some 2,000 University of Massachusetts students in the Southwest Residential Area who went to class without a shower because an underground water main snapped early Friday.

Peter Wozniak, director of the Physical Plant, said a 10 inch water pipe buried 10 feet under the walkway near Prince Hall broke in half at about 2 a.m. and caused flooding in the Southwest area.

Wozniak said he immediately telephoned the physical plant mechanical crew who shut down the water line and used a backhoe to dig a 10 foot by 10 foot hole.

Water was shut off in Washington, John Quincy Adams, Kennedy and John Adams residence halls and Hampden Commons until about 2 p.m., he said.

Ian Guarnieri, who lives in Kennedy, said he was forced to brush his teeth in the Campus Center men's room because of the shutdown.

"I got up early to go to my first class, turned on the faucet to brush my teeth and a jolt of muddy water came out. I knew something was wrong," he said.

Guarnieri said he was able to shower in nearby Coolidge Residence Hall after class.

Stephen Lipof, who also lives in Kennedy, said he expected the water to be off in the morning because he was up at 2 a.m. and a large puddle, "like a lake," had formed outside the building.

"The grossest part of it all was that you couldn't flush the toilets," he said.

Meredith Johnson, a Washington resident, said the lack of a flushing system caused the entire hallway to "reek."

"It was awful," she said. I got up early to take a shower and there was no water so I sat around doing nothing."

Many students went to Boyden Gymnasium or other dormitories to shower, said Edward Shuster, who lives in John Adams. He said he took a shower Thursday night so his routine was not affected.

Bill Santamaria, of John Quincy Adams, said he "toughed it out" and waited until the water was restored before taking a shower. He said his daily routine was not upset that much.

"I wasn't as clean as I would have liked but sometimes life throws you some bumps," he said. "I really didn't think it was that big a deal — it wasn't something to get upset over."

Wozniak said the mechanics, who fixed the pipe in about eight hours, did "an outstanding job." The pipe was about 20 years old and the material is expected to last 25 to 30 years, he said.

"Part of the process of maintaining a water distribution system is being prepared to repair these types of breaks," he said. "The break was not unusual."

Overseas programs available worldwide

International exchange worth the trip: students

By KERRY HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

Anita Carson said if you can substitute formal dinners with a dress code for late night takeout pizza, then going to the United Kingdom is definitely worth the trip.

Carson, an industrial engineer who spent the past year at the University College in Swansea, Wales, said, "Everyone can do it if they are a little bit open-minded.

"There aren't 24-hour pizza services and the men don't lift weights and are thinner, but you have to accept that as part of the culture," she said.

Hundreds of students like Carson study abroad every year through the International Programs Office (IPO) at the University of Massachusetts. The program offers student exchanges all over the world in a wide range of fields.

Maryelise Lamet, associate director of the overseas programs at IPO said studying abroad is more than an academic experience.

"Studying abroad is the beginning in opening of a door. Seldom are there people who are able to close that door," she said.

"Students have a perspective on learning that they never had before."

Carson said it was "refreshing" to experience life outside of UMass.

"You had to be yourself because all you had was yourself," Carson said. "I would advise people to go for it. People can get caught in a rut here."

Jeremy Deex, a Japanese major who spent two years in Japan, said living in a different culture can be "weird." He said many people have preconceived notions of what Americans are like.

"You do a lot of soul searching when you are in a foreign place," he said. "I found that people are people, good and bad just like anyplace else."

Cynthia Boylen, who spent the past year at Trinity College in Dublin, Ireland, said she experienced less academic pressure there than at UMass.

"Going away to Ireland made me realize things don't have to be high pressure to be good," Boylen said.

Rebecca Kemble, an anthropology major who spent the year at University of Nairobi in Kenya, said her biggest learning experience was being in a third world nation and seeing the forces at work in Africa.

"My values were clarified and I was able to figure out what I wanted to do because students there are a lot more focused," she said.

Lamet said the office offers many summer programs as well as one and two semester exchanges in which students receive credits. General information on student exchange is available at the Clark International Center across from Baker Residence Hall.

Also, there will be an IPO fair on Oct. 18 in the campus center for all students interested in going abroad in the future.

Convocation celebrates the return of UMass nursing school

By SARAH DEMASTER
Collegian Staff

Dr. Melanie Dreher, newly-appointed dean of the School of Nursing at the University of Massachusetts, was honored Friday at a convocation in Bowker Auditorium.

The convocation marked the University Board of Trustees' decision last February to re-establish the nursing program as a separate school. The program had been a division of the School of Health Sciences since 1973.

"This [convocation] is a celebration of our faculty, students, and our re-emerged school," Dreher said. "I feel a little guilty, because I was not part of the struggle to re-open the school."

Dr. Lucie Young Kelley, professor of public health and nursing at Columbia University and keynote speaker at the convocation, was given an honorary degree from UMass for her work as an "influential leader in nursing," Dreher said.

Kelley said, "I'm glad for the concern of the future of nursing and health care [at UMass].

"The quality of health care will be one of the greatest issues in years to come," she said. "Nurses can get involved in quality care because they are closest to the patients."

Chancellor Joseph Duffey addressed the audience of some 40 people, and asserted that although state budget cutbacks have plagued the University, the School of Nursing represents a positive future.

"We gather as well to celebrate this University's commitment to nursing education," Duffey said. "The state appears to be looking for ways to reduce education, but we are looking ahead.

"When the state budget cuts are falling on the young and infirm, we have to ask who cares — it's nurses," he added.

Kelley said nurses are vital to health care because there are many unresolved problems that only nursing research can solve. These problems include self-care in all cultures and age groups and preventing and minimizing environmental health problems, she said.

"We need baccalaureate, masters, and doctoral nurses, as well as hands-on care," she said. "We need high-tech and high-touch."

Ellan Cole, graduate program director of the School of Nursing, said the change from a division to a school had been recommended for a long time.

"Nursing schools are usually organized that way in other universities," Cole said.

The administration changed the school to a division in 1973, because they "wanted to make it easier to control," she said.

She said the change had a negative effect on the school of nursing.

"We had less status at meetings with other schools," she said, because other schools had representation through a dean, and UMass did not.

New Dean of the School of Nursing, Melanie Dreher

The creation of a separate school will bring more autonomy to the dean, because she will control the budget and decisions within the school, Cole said.

Lisa Watroba, a junior in the School of Nursing, said she hopes the school will now be more recognized by the local community and by the administration.

Dorm provides support system for minority students

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff
and BETH O'TOOLE
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts at Amherst, a focal point for racial unrest in recent years, has turned a residence hall with a history of racial problems into a place with a support system for minority students.

Gorman Residence Hall, a newly renovated dormitory on campus, kicked off its first semester as a "multicultural" building last month.

The residence hall houses some 370 students, but under a new program entitled: "Nuance," meaning shades of difference, priority housing will be given to African-Americans, Asians, Hispanics, and Native Americans.

The residence director, Paulette Dalpes, said the number of minority students who have chosen to live in Gorman has tripled since last fall to about 60 students.

"The energy here is just so great with the students of color," she said. "You get a sense that there are lots of people in the world doing lots of different things. It gives people a wide perspective on life."

Racial unrest at the University reached a high point more than a year ago when African-American students took over the New Africa House, a nearby administrative building, to protest a racially-motivated brawl on campus.

This unrest resurfaced recently when about 20 protesters took over the Collegian offices to protest a "racist" editorial by David R. Mark, the editor in chief.

> 'The energy here is just so great with the students of color. You get a sense that there are lots of people in the world doing lots of different things. It gives people a wide perspective on life."
> – Paulette Dalpes

The protesters asked for Mark's resignation and demanded that the newspaper reinstate the Black Affairs desk, which was abolished recently in favor of a Multicultural Affairs desk, and to establish a third world affairs desk.

Last week, the protesters held a workshop on racism at the Collegian. After the protesters restated their demands, the Collegian staff members ordered a special meeting for tomorrow to formulate a reply.

Ms. Dalpes said Gorman was chosen last spring as a site for the program because a large number of racially-motivated incidents have occurred there.

Two semesters ago, two African-American residents received prank phone calls and racial notes telling them to "go home" were slipped under their door.

Last semester, flyers illustrating apartheid in South Africa were cut down from a bulletin board, she said. When new flyers were returned, the entire board was torn from the wall.

One recipient of the notes, Gabrielle Buford, a senior and co-president of Nuance, said she has encountered harassment each of the three years she has lived in Gorman.

"When I first came here, you could count the number of minorities on my hand," Buford said. "There aren't that many of us here and it's hard to keep us here when stuff like this happens.

Buford said her roommate was unable to cope with the repeated prank phone calls and harrasment last semester and moved out of the residence hall.

Co-President Lester Williams said Nuance is run by a board of students. Meetings open and closed, are held weekly to discuss ,racism and plan upcoming events, he said.

"Nuance is headed in a very positive direction," Williams said. "We are the future dealing with the present."

The program's officers will invite white students to attend many of the multicultural programs, including an upcoming International food fair, Buford said.

"Now they're seeing they're going to be involved. They've been ignorant of our culture all these years. All they know is stereotypes and we want to surpass that," she said.

Tomas Garcia, a resident assistant who is Hispanic, said students can better relate to students of their own background when dealing with racial situations.

"People of color on this campus are so spread out," he said. "Who can you relate to who has experienced the same oppression?"

Dalpes said some white students have questioned the program's existence, claiming it was a form of segregation.

"There were some rumblings from the European-American students, talking about segregation," she said. "When I look at our society; our housing is segregated, our education is segregated. Whether we want to admit it or not, they are."

Dalpes said she will be teaching an eight-week, one-credit colloquim for white residents in Gorman entitled: "AWARE," which is an acronym for "Allies Working Against Racism Everywhere."

She said the voluntary colloquim is an effort to help white students understand racism and cope with the changing needs in Gorman. "We're not trying to meet the needs of white students in this program," she said. "We're trying to meet the needs of people of color."

Vehicle hit with eggs; stereo system stolen

A woman reported last week her vehicle parked in Lot 65 was smeared with eggs, police said.

Also, a victim in the Southwest residential area reported receiving annoying phone calls, police said.

Arrests

- Benjamin Brantley, 23, of 90 Rifle St., Springfield, was arrested on an outstanding warrant from UMass police at the Hampden County Jail.

Larceny

- A man reported his stereo was stolen from his vehicle while it was parked in Lot 22, police said.

Police said the vehicle was entered through the driver's window. The loss was estimated at $150.

Colors to mark 'Coming Out Day'

By NATHAN KRYSTALL
Collegian Staff

If you want to support the second annual "National Coming Out Day," Wednesday, wear any pink and/or black clothes you've got in your closet, say members of the Lesbian Bisexual and Gay Alliance.

The day, which commemorates the 1987 March on Washington for lesbian, bisexual and gay rights, marks another step people are asked to take in their "coming out" process, said Max Mitchell, co-president of the Lesbian, Bisexual and Gay Alliance.

Mitchell said "coming out" is a gradual process consisting of a few distinct steps starting with oneself.

"The first step is recognizing that you have a preference to members of the same or both genders," he said.

He said the next step is coming out to friends and parents. Another step is coming out in public — in a class, to a teacher or by political action for lesbian, bisexual and gay rights.

"Coming out in public means not being anonymous," Mitchell said. "We're asking people to wear pink and/or black to show support for the day and the people who are coming out."

Last year people were asked to wear jeans in support of the day. Mitchell said it's a day to do something "observable."

"Do something you haven't already done," he said. "Come out to a class or a friend."

He said the first step, admitting to himself that he is gay, was the biggest step for him and probably is for anyone.

"You can skip other steps, but you can't skip that one," he said.

Mitchell said more people coming out and more people supporting the day will mean increased power with which to fight oppression, discrimination and homophobia.

He said because the AIDS epidemic was originally associated as a "gay disease" in this country, it set back the Lesbian, Bisexual and Gay Rights movement, which had been making steady progress.

"AIDS gave anti-gay rights activists a reason to hate homosexuals and bisexuals even more," he said. "It gave them a reason to ostracize them and discriminate against them."

"Coming Out day will further the Lesbian, Bisexual and Gay Rights movement by saying I'm proud of being lesbian, bisexual and gay and I'm not going to be stepped on anymore," he said.

There will also be an infomation table outside the Hatch during the day and a candlelight vigil tomorrow night, Mitchell said. "The vigil is to recognize people who have come out and those who have suffered because they have come out," he said.

Freedom of speech, not oppression by Gore

By DANIELLE DOWLING
Collegian Staff

Ignorance is one of the greatest scourges to attack the human community. It ranks up there with greed and apathy. Ignorance gives us reason to hate, to fear, to oppress, and to kill. It was this disease that formed the Parent's Music Resource Center in the early 80's.

The PMRC, as it is better known, was formed by a bunch of bored housewives who had nothing better to do but to find ways to abolish the First Amendment. The most notorious of this pack is Tipper Gore, wife of Senator Al Gore. It was a real joy for me to see this twit keep her mouth shut about PMRC matters while her husband ran for president.

Tipper asks us, "Where are those songs like "Shimmy, Shimmy, Coco-Bop"?" Well Tipper, it is your prerogative to listen to what I feel is mindless garbage, and it is my prerogative to listen to what you feel is demonic, perverse noise. It's called freedom of choice — a freedom I once took for granted before the PMRC was formed.

The PMRC will have you believe that they are not trying to force their false morality down your throat. Of course they have nothing to do with the fact that major record stores across the country, with the exception of Tower Records who will not be a party to such fascism, do not carry certain albums by "controversial" rap, heavy metal,and hardcore groups. You can't blame them when you go to your local 7-Eleven or Walgreen store to find that there are no heavy metal journals on the magazine racks. Nope, they're just so innocent you want to crown them with the jewelled orb of sainthood.

ART ATTACK

An interesting point to note is that more often than not the PMRC will target minority musicians while ignoring the transgressions of major pop stars. They will go on and on about how satanic and violent heavy metal is and how sexually perverse rap music is, but when Madonna shakes her naked butt on national prime time televison they seem to look the other way. I suppose their influential friends have no power over Madonna's bum.

The substantiation for the existence of the PMRC is to protect the innocent minds of young children. The PMRC claims that certain types of music cause such societal ills as drug usage, sexual promiscuity, and violence on the part of our nation's young. This claim is utter nonsense. The youth of today are troubled because they live in a society that has almost no respect for them. Think about it. We will spend billions of dollars on farcical outer space weaponry, but we won't spend a dime to fix crumbling schools or hire decent teachers.

Music is a reflection of society, not a dictator of its mores. Perhaps we should spend more time trying to fix these obvious problems rather than point fingers at who's to blame. But then I guess it's easier to find a scapegoat for our problems than to take a hard look at ourselves as a nation, see what has gone wrong, and take steps to fix what needs to be fixed.

What really irks me about the whole situation is that these so-called experts on the moral content of music lyrics, are totally clueless as to what they're talking about. Take for example a favorite target of theirs, Ozzy Osbourne. A sample of his lyrics from the song "Crazy Train" will prove to you how abjectly inane the PMRC really is: "Maybe it's not to late/ To learn how to love/ and forget how to hate." Gee willikers! That was just so evil that it sends shivers up and down my spine!

Granted, there are bands out there whose lyrics are truly repulsive. But that's the beauty of America; they have the right to express their beliefs and opinions freely. Perhaps they should exercise some decorum and consideration for those who might be offended, but there is no law saying that they must. The fact is that these people are musicians, not parents, and the responsibility to guide the youth of our nation should not be placed in their laps. If we gave our kids the support and reassurance they need, maybe we wouldn't have to worry about them taking certain lyrics seriously.

Actually, the PMRC has been the best publicity for heavy metal. Since they decided to go on this mission to put advisory labels on albums to warn parents about the albums' content, metal has had a sharp increase in popularity. However, this fascist machine still exists, perpetuating ignorance in our society.

Steel drum band educates, parties

Atlantic Clarion Steel Drum Band
Iron Horse
Sunday, Oct. 8

The Atlantic Clarion Steel Drum Band brought a taste of Trinidad to the Iron Horse Sunday night, with their lively beats and Carribean pans.

The seven member band from Woodshole, Massachusetts demonstrated the versatility of the steel band, from being a party or jazz band or a chamber orchestra. They created an amazing variety of sounds from the tonal quality differences of the pans.

Their leader and founder Carl Chase explained the differences in the drums to the audience. The tenor pans, playing the lead, made the highest soprano sounds, while the viola set of pans played the harmony parts. The chord sounds were played on the guitar set of pans, which also can sound like trombones. The cello pans and the bass pans were larger drums. Since only three notes could be played on one of the brass pan's 55 gallon oil barrel, the bassist played seven barrels to play 21 different notes.

They played two sets of soca, calypso, and bossa nova, and merengue songs. The drums made sound illusions that seemed to bring keyboards and string instruments into the music hall. Essentially, they were more than a seven man band, they were a seven man orchestra.

Along with soca-calypso favorites such as "Yellowbird," "Sing Ram Bam," "The Bamba," and "Say Say," they also played some bossa nova, known for its mesmerizing Latin beat, and Trinidadian soca hits, which won the Panorama in 1987 and 1988.

The drums got the crowd up and dancing, to breathtaking beats. The Atlantic Clarion Steel Band brought an awareness of the steel drum, along with a good time.

Get down with Business

If you're serious about fun and feel like dancing, shuffle over to The Hatch tonight where Fifth Business will be taking care of business. Bassist Tom Mahnken says, "A splendid time is guaranteed."

The Northampton-based quartet, specializing in "mostly up-tempo, cutting edge, dance rock originals", has been working steadily in its current incarnation to enthusiastic response since June. They played at Sheehan's Cafe in Northampton four times and opened for Ten Years After in Springfield.

Although more than half of the band's repertoire is comprised of original material, they do cover selections by classic soul luminaries such as Marvin Gaye, James Brown, Stevie Wonder and Wilson Pickett. Often featured on W.H.M.P.-fm's Valley Showcase, their latest tape is entitled "Like You Read About", an impressive, energetic seven song cassette.

October's Multicolored Birthstone...OPAL

BELIEVE IT OR NOT, one scene in an 1829 bestseller by Sir Walter Scott, Anne of Geierstein, destroyed the European opal market for nearly 50 years. One of the book's characters, accused of being a demon, dies shortly after her mysterious, fiery opal loses all color when touched accidentally by a drop of holy water. Was the power woman really a demon and her opal some kind of infernal talisman? Or was she simply a victim of her — and, by implication, all opal's fragility? Readers took no chances and immediately stopped buying the gem. Within a matter of months, the market had crashed and opal prices were down at least 50%.

It took a remarkable find of black opal at Lightning Ridge in New South Whales, Australia, in 1877, to revive the market for this gem. Australia's spectacular new opals took the world by storm. Indeed, there have been almost no opals found in the last 50 years to match what came from Lightning Ridge in its late 19th and early 20th century heyday. No wonder dealers sometimes liken Lightning Ridge's significances to that of Kashmir for sapphire, a Himalayan source discovered around the same time that set the standard for sapphire in the same way Lightning Ridge did for opal.

See our large selection of Opals this month!

Rockin' Dave and the Rent Party
Sheehan's Cafe
Saturday, Oct. 7

Sheehan's Cafe hosted a rockin' rent party Saturday night with Rockin' Dave and The Rent Party. Dave made his appearance on accordian, stealing the stage from the Rent Party who started the show. His high energy electrified the stage, almost adding another dimension to the picture when he bounced on with his firery red accordian. Jolting the instrument maniacally, he bopped his head to the beat until his baseball cap flew from his greasy blond hair. This contrasted with mellower spots where he gently lead the soft notes out, with a look of suppression on his face.

For his second number he tore off his black velvet cape and lost the accordian in preparation for some wild guitar music. The fans cheered as he sang 'Red Lion Mike / everything's gonna be all right'.

The crowd grew rowdier as the night progressed, getting into a rockin' state of mind. His music inspired wild 60's type dancing. He eased into rhythmic blues, then cultivated a reggae beat. All this with a jazzy sax in the background, and Dave himself intermittently on harmonica had the crowd rocking. Then he introduced some rap into the scene, and the dancers took on a more modern style.

Rockin' Dave and The Rent Party play radical and diversified music. Many lead musicians will switch guitars during a show, but Dave demonstrated his talent on accordian, harmonica, guitar, and even washboards.

Dave shows a whole lotta' charisma on stage, and the band is definately worth seeing if you like radical rock, and comedic entertainment.

Smoking Lips start a fire

Flaming Lips
Hampshire College
Friday, Oct. 6

Oklahoma's Flaming Lips really smoked the stage at Hampshire College on Friday. I literally could never see the band because of their smoke machine which was on for the entire performance. The machine, along with the constant strobe light, made the show visually droning. However, there were enough - freakish hairstyles, groovy clothes and funky dancing to take the place of those things we all love to see in bands who don't have light shows.

Fortunately what the Flaming Lips had to offer did not need a stage show. The music was completely captivating and needed nothing to go along with it, such as spandex or big hair. They started out with some Echo and the Bunnymen covers, and then delved into some mellow psychedelic-type stuff that occasionally bordered on sounding dangerously similar to Pink Floyd.

Their cool vocal harmonies, tough guitars, and ability to build up into heavy grooves, put the Flaming Lips in league with Jane's Addiction, taking 70's hard rock and remolding it for the youth of the 80's and 90's. Since they do this with sincerity and add plenty of other elements, their music has soul and integrity — the basic elements which are lacking in today's world rock.

During the latter half of their set, the Flaming Lips let loose with noisier, faster songs which were basically just straight ahead rockers. These were full of raw energy and power, unrefined and tough, more akin to the Stooges or MC5 than Guns n' Roses.

Steel Pole Bathtub, a schizophrenic trio from San Francisco, opened up the show with their blend of weird artsy noise and heavy rock. The lead vocals were loud, young and snotty, yet they were well matched with the pulsing rhythms and chaotic fervor of the instruments.

WOMEN'S ISSUES

Doctoral student conquers obstacles

By KATERI WALSH
Collegian Staff

The first thing you notice is her pride.

The second thing you notice is that Nancy Rios, a 32-year-old Puerto Rican doctoral student at the University of Massachusetts, earned every bit of that pride.

Rios came to Amherst in 1984 as a single mother who could not speak English. She has since received a Bachelor of Arts and a Master's degree in education and plans to complete her doctorate in future studies through the School of Education. She is an assistant professor of human services at Springfield College.

Explaining her accomplishments, Rios said, "It was my willingness to say 'I can.' What I remember most of all is telling myself over and over again, 'I can do it.'"

She said her strength comes from "being Puerto Rican, being a woman, a single mother, and being — to use a word that I hate — a minority. Struggling by myself against injustice. By being a witness to unfairness, to corruption, to racism."

Rios also cited the Everywoman's Center's now defunct Women's Admission and General Educational Support (WAGES) program as having helped her adjust and deal with the bureaucratic "red tape" many students face.

The WAGES program, cut last year because of budget constraints, helped non-traditional students enter the University. The program helped them find child care and housing, assisted them with paperwork and offered counseling.

"I feel very sorry that there are many women out there that need a program like this and the University has closed the doors," Rios said. "Many of these women are poor women who cannot survive at the University without this support."

Between classes and work, Rios is busy helping to raise revenue and awareness for The University of El Salvador, which she calls "the university that refuses to die."

In 1988, Rios went to UES to help coordinate a series of lectures. This trip marked the beginning of a new commitment by Rios to help improve conditions at the school.

"To look at a university with 36,000 students with absolutely no resources that was still working...that's impressive," Rios said. "The spirit of the students and faculty has kept that school alive."

She said the military took over the school from 1980 to 1984 and destroyed or sold all the books and much of the equipment. In 1986, an earthquake destroyed 70 percent of the campus's buildings. The physical destruction remains today.

As a chairwoman on the UES-UMass committee, Rios sends books to UES and organizes support for the university. She is working to establish a sisterhood between UMass and UES.

"I hope that [UMass Chancellor Joseph] Duffey listens to us," Rios said. "There are 36,000 students down there. We are like them, but we have so many resources and they have nothing."

She speaks of her students at Springfield College with the same commitment that she has reserved for her other projects.

"I don't want to empower people; I want to help them empower themselves. That is how you fuel social change," she said.

Two years ago Rios, the mother of six-year-old Fernado Ojeda, met David Brooks, a doctoral student of Latin-American history. They share their home, their passion for learning, and their lives.

"I think that my life is almost too perfect. I'm almost done with school, I have a very happy child, a wonderful relationship, and the rewards of my teaching. It's almost too good to be true."

Smith group aids low-income students

By DANIELLE BIONDA
Collegian Staff
and MURDO MACPHAIL
Collegian Correspondent

The difficulties of surviving on a low-income budget do not exist only in the large urban centers.

Realizing this, students at Smith College in Northampton have taken the first steps in the Five College area toward assisting traditional and non-traditional students who are struggling through college with particularly difficult financial burdens.

The recently-formed Association of Low-Income Students aims to overcome the prejudices and disadvantages that some students suffer because they are unable to afford books, bedding, or even a place to live, said founding member Gail Lambert, a Smith student.

"We want to expose the hidden costs of poverty, such as humiliation and social prejudice,". Lambert said.

The group hopes to provide low-income students with equal opportunities for education, employment and training, and to educate the public about the plight of low-income students, Lambert said.

Previously, low-income students found support through word-of-mouth because the resources that existed were not readily available to he public, she said.

Lambert said the group is in the planning stages right now. With 30 members and a growing directory of inexpensive or free services that are available, students realize that the association is a necessity in the area, she said.

Single parents who are also students often find they alone cannot meet the double responsibility of supporting a family as well as affording tuition payments, she said.

"There's so many times people say 'I just don't know what to do,'" she said. "We want people to know that there is somewhere to go, and that someone has gone through this before."

In order to accomplish that, she said, the group first needs a firm foundation at Smith College.

"Right now we are a first cry for help," she said.

Lambert said the group intends to expand to include the entire Five College area.

Magical Morrissey mystifies the masses

Bill Morrissey
Iron Horse
Friday, Oct. 6

Songwriting is more than a skill, it's an art. Taking the time to find that one perfect word to invoke that perfect image is something that few people in the world have the creativity and talent to do. Bill Morrissey is one of those few people.

Friday night, Morrissey opened the door on his life and let us view his messy innards. Sounding a lot like John Hiatt in his raspy, country tinged voice, Morrissey covered material from his three albums (his third, Standing Eight, will be released on Oct. 15) in his two hour plus set.

His dry, deadpan humor, which is apparent in many of his songs, and obvious in his stories between songs, kept the audience in stitches. The topper was his Moussey beer story. Morrissey likes to drink while in the studio (almost every one of his songs had an alcoholic reference in it). Knowing that he'd be up all night mixing his album, he and his producer decided to drink non-alcoholic Moussey beer.

REVIEW

They ended up going on a drinking spree. "Three days later, I ended up broke and alone in this fleabag motel in Dorchester, and I remembered exactly how I got there."

Before singing his current single, the beautiful "Handsome Molly," on which Vega sings harmony, he told of Vega's 20 minute killer drum solo in the middle of the song that got edited out. He also mentioned that the song is on Windham Hill's Legacy compilation. "My friends had no end of fun with that: 'Windham Hill, Bill? Did you have to record it under a pyramid?' But the check cleared."

Many of his songs also display his cynical humor. "Grizzly Bear," "a class struggle kiss-and-tell story," is about his date from hell with a yuppie. ("She spent so much time in the mirror, boys/She didn't know left from right.")

"It's Dangerous Out There" is a winter paranoia song in which he decides not to leave bed until baseball season begins. And in "Cars and Drivers," he proves that he could tell everything about a person just from the car he or she drives.

Morrissey also displayed his sensitive, but not mushy, personal side. Armed with only his acoustic guitar, he says in "The Married Man," "I still drink my whiskey/I just water it down."

He also sang of his painful divorce. He talked candidly of his low self-esteem while on a fling after his break-up in "She Wants To Make Love." ("She wants to make love/I want to drink/Drinking is what I do best.")

He tugged at everyone's heartstrings on his ballads, such as "These Cold Fingers," "Summer Night" and "Rosie." Stories of his smalltown life, "Pantherville" and "Smalltown On the River," were equally as moving.

If Morrissey wasn't as great as he was, the whole place would have gone home talking about opening act Barb Schloff. With her long, straight, blonde hair, black tank top and angelic voice, she was a picture of innocence. But, like Suzanne Vega, she has a bit of bite to her voice to let the world know she's not naive. She sings of her past pains, but insists on remaining optimistic. She is not afraid to sing of her most personal experiences, and is just as gifted a songwriter/poet that Morrissey is. The only problem was that her set was not long enough. I could have listened to her all night.

Blues master Montgomery rants and raves

By PAUL D'AGOSTINO
Collegian Correspondent

With a sway and a spit, James Montgomery rocked the house with his rhythm and blues Thursday night at the Hatch. After Montgomery exchanged his beer for a harmonica, which he keeps in a fishing tackle box, he and the band began to wail. The small band of guitar, bass and drums delivered big numbers such as James Brown's "I Feel Good," and Albert Collins' "Don't Lose Your Cool."

The few people who were wise enough to attend were treated to 2 hours of the best live rhythm and blues around. Dancing was a must throughout what the band called, "the party portion of the evening." Guitar and harmonica never ceased delivering cool blues riffs as the night went on. Montgomery and the band showed no signs of tiring during their energetic performance.

The band performed each song with as much enthusiasm as the next. Paul Murphy's guitar playing would have made Stevie Ray Vaughan sweat, and Montgomery's vocals put Mick Jagger to shame. At the end of the night, Montgomery thanked the audience and began a jam session which included Clapton riffs and playing guitar against the microphone stand.

After the performance, Montgomery commented on the show and what it was like to be back at UMass. UMass is where the James Montgomery Band got their start back in 1970. "We'd start off with R&B tunes we grew up with, and then play original songs. I can't tell you how great it is to play UMass."

He also elaborated on how he started here at UMass 20 years ago, "Back in the 70's I played UMass. I realized there was a world outside of Boston in UMass. If we can do well here, we can do well in other places."

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted

What do you do in the face of mediocrity?

Overheard in a Tower Library elevator:

"There aren't any philosophers anymore," he said to his female friend as we stopped at floor three.

"Yeah," she said.

No philosophers?

She continued: "They're all dead."

David R. Mark

My interest was sparked, but I remained silent.

What of Francis Fukuyama, who believes history has come to an end? And what of E.D. Hirsch, who believes children's historical knowledge has come to an end?

Now stopped at floor five, the subject turned to heroes, or lack thereof:

"And there aren't acts of bravery anymore," she said.

Oh please.

"Yeah," he said as we hit floor six. "Everybody just lets things happen to them. No one goes out on a limb."

What about the man who stood in front of the tank in China, daring the tank driver to run him over?

"I know what you mean," she said.

What about the people of Eastern Europe, escaping their oppressors with only the whiff of freedom to lead their way?

"It's because of money," she said as we stopped at floor eight. "People are more concerned with making money than with values. They don't care who they hurt, as long as they make lots of money."

I hit my palm against my forehead.

"The whole world's [going to hell]," he said. "Nobody cares though. It takes too much time to worry about anyone but yourself."

"Yeah," she said as they got off floor 11.

I had missed my floor. I forgot why I was here anyway, I was so disgusted with my fellow Minutepeople.

Do they really believe no one does anything anymore?

There are few philosophers because few of us take time just to think. Even though not all among us have the capacity to be the next John Stuart Mill or Karl Marx, we can still have an original thought, put it down on paper and debate it with others.

One hardly has to look around the corner to see an act of bravery.

Just look at all the people in our country fighting AIDS, or children in America's urban centers fighting poverty. These are the people who today make this nation the "home of the brave."

There is an adage — you can't get something for nothing. I hold that as a truth. People who don't fight for what they believe in and then blame the world are foolish.

How can people say the world's going to [pick your favorite expletive] if they don't do anything to change it? What of all the organizations in the world asking for help in their fights? Do they not matter?

An example:

People always complain about the budget cuts. I've spoken to so many reporters from Boston, New York and elsewhere about the budget cuts that I'm sick. It's too depressing to keep discussing, explaining and rationalizing.

But when that question appears — and it always does — I feel our school is guilty of neglect.

"So how many people rallied against the cuts last spring?" a reporter asked.

"Maybe 1,000," I exaggerated.

"That's it?" he asked.

"Yep."

If we want an end to the budget cuts — or for that matter any form of mediocrity — we have to act and do, not just criticize.

Sexist comic strips

There are no comic strips written by women in the Collegian!. This is an outrage. It is obviously a manifestation of sexism in our society.

On September 29th, all six comic strips were predominantly male-oriented. "The Far Side" featured four males. "Bones in the Barrel" had one man. "Calvin and Hobbes" had one male, one female, and one stuffed animal but it was clear that Calvin was the star, not his female baby-sitter. "Doonesbury" featured three men. "Robotman" contained two male characters. There were four boys and only one girl in "The Kids are Alright."

On the next Friday, the situation was worse. Of the six regular strips, only "Calvin and Hobbs" had one female character that day.

Although the comics are intended to be funny and entertaining, one should look seriously at what the subtle message is when the comic page is male-dominated. The message is that women are unimportant and don't matter.

Hardly "born in sin"

It's Monday morning at 9:05. I'm walking from the bus stop at Hasbrouck to Machmer, literally minding my own business. I hear someone shouting, more like yelling.

Erin Martin

He's standing by the ramp to the library holding a huge flag of some sort. A woman is handing pamphlets to students. His voice gets louder, more powerful as I get closer.

On this rainy Monday morning not too many people are around to hear him. But I hear him shouting. I hear what he's saying. It's not what a tuition-paying college student wants to hear. At least not this tuition-paying student.

"Are there any living souls around here or are you all robots. You are all a bunch of worthless zombies!" he screams at me about two feet from my face.

I look at his flag. You are born in sin.

I didn't know that. I always thought my parents loved each other. I was taught that I was a result of their love. How can this man tell me under what conditions I was born, or anyone else for that matter.

"Why are you in school? Don't you have a mind of your own? You go to class, you sit and look at your teachers. You take in information and you spit it back out. Tell me professor, how do I live my life? Teach me, I don't know anything!!"

All right, I'm almost to my class and I can still hear this infuriating man.

Where does he get off coming to a campus where we all pay money to attend?

Who does he think he is coming to the center of campus screaming at me because I am going to class? Classes I want to take, because I wanted to come to college. I want to further my education. I want to learn from my professors.

I do have a soul! I may be a zombie at 9:05 on Monday, but not the type that needs to be saved.

You need to be saved! Become reborn! Be born away from sin! The sign screams.

This man is telling me, and every other person within a five mile radius that we are all wrong. No matter what religion, race or class we may belong to. I think this man has probably offended everyone on this campus.

I found him an insult to my intelligence. I can't believe a man like that could be allowed on a campus of college students from all walks of life and all different backgrounds, who share at least on common interest.

We are all here to get educated, and no one has a right to stand here and put us down for it.

Pumpkin patch pillage produces panic

The Great Pumpkin had better watch out.

There are evil people out to get him. Well . . . in Hatfield at least.

During the early morning of October 1st, under the cover of darkness, some devilish fiends descended upon a pumpkin patch, armed with razor-sharp machetes.

Meredith O'Brien

What did these prowlers want with the innocent pumpkins there? Their innards.

Some 160 pumpkins were viciously sliced open. Their only means of reproduction — their seeds — were extracted.

The owner of this Hatfield haven for homeless pumpkins (advertising that patrons can "pick their own," provided that they give their pumpkins proper and decent homes), said that more than $1,000 in damage was done to his precious patch.

The mournful owner was extremely bewildered.

"The aliens descended on the pumpkins," he said.

Those poor pumpkins — their lives used in a ruthless alien experiment where their reproductive seeds will probably be bred with some sinister beings.

The animals.

But then, this obviously distressed pumpkin owner mused another scenario.

"It was a very serious attempt to get enough of the seeds to plant a large quantity of similar pumpkins," he concluded, "and it was also easier than sending relatives to buy one at a time for the next two weeks."

The plot thickens.

So . . . it could have been malicious pumpkin zealots conspiring to steal all of the pumpkin seeds in Hampshire County. . . in New England!

With the number of seeds that have been mercilessly ripped out of the victims, over 50 acres of new pumpkins could be cultivated, according to the owner.

So what are the rest of us pumpkins lovers to do?

Will the harvesters valiantly attempt to sell their goods (pumpkins included) despite these midnight marauders? Or will they be driven into seclusion?

That would hardly make for a good harvest season, never mind the pleasant atmosphere of autumn that compliments the colorful foliage. The entire season would be ruined because of a midnight pumpkin patch pillage that forced farmers to close their stands.

And what about Halloween?

The celebration that is usually filled with fun-filled masquerades, luscious candy, and the ritual tradition of carving the jack-o'-lanterns, would all be cancelled this year out of fear and intimidation.

Parents will not buy their annual pumpkins, for fear of the children's nightmares of machetes. There will be no pumpkins on front porches or displayed in windows. Pumpkin patches will be fearfully abandoned, for fear that the perpetrators might return for another ravishing.

The pumpkin will symbolize American violence, not the cheerful New England harvest.

Linus will be crushed.

There are many women's rights advocates who claim that pornographic magazines should be banned because they perpetuate a negative image and treatment of women. They also believe that these magazines portray women as objects, not as human beings.

There are others who believe that pornography is a perfectly legitimate form of expression protected by the Constitution. Banning of these magazines would be a severe infringement of their First Amendment rights.

what happened in the first half at Rhode Island. I was disappointed with our thinking in the first half, particularly because we've been in that situation before."

Gaudette, who along with teammates April Kater and Kim Montgomery made the all-tournament team, missed a wide-open shot three minutes in after burning goalie Donna-Jean Enright. But two minutes later she would atone for her mistake to put UM on top.

Kater stole an errant clearing pass out of the backfield and fed Gaudette, who drove straight in on Enright and banged a shot into the right corner for her fifth goal of the year.

Rudy would have liked to have gotten more goals early, not for the sake of winning the title but merely to get his bench some quality playing time. The chance would finally come when UMass put FIU away with a trio of goals in the second half.

A long punt by goalkeeper Mary Curtis cleared the midfield line and was picked up by Kater. She fed Gaudette streaking down the left side, and the fleet forward bore in on Enright with the perfect angle for a goal. But she unselfishly dished it to Kater, who had filled the middle, for a gimme into an open net.

Gaudette set up the next goal as well, toasting a pair of defenders on the right side of the box and finding freshman Kim Eynard at the pipe for an easy knock-home. Eynard would also add the final goal, taking a Swartz feed and dancing through the FIU defense before beating Enright.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

HAPPY BIRTHDAY! IN THE NEXT YEAR OF YOUR LIFE: Your friendly and conscientious manner will win you new allies and admirers. If employed in the arts, you can look forward to an exceptionally busy and happy winter. Your punctuality and attention to detail make your competitors seem lazy. Beware of any get-rich-quick schemes proposed by friends next spring. Keep your feet firmly anchored to the ground. Deception is possible in a romantic relationship. The best partner is someone who will be loyal in both bad times and good.

CELEBRITIES BORN ON THIS DATE: actress Helen Hayes, jazz legend Thelonius Monk, politician Adlai Stevenson III, author James Clavell.

ARIES(March 21-April 19): Keep informed about employer-employee relationships. Scrutinize fine print before signing contracts or agreements. Mate's part-time employment could aid your efforts to balance the budget. Romance holds few surprises.

TAURUS(April 20-May 20): Work done in seclusion is completed quickly. Deal with people firsthand to achieve the best results. News from afar holds financial promise. Follow up any hot leads. A social encounter could foster romance.

GEMINI(May 21-June 20): Keep your nose to the grindstone no matter how you feel. Changes are in the works that will benefit you. Real estate transactions are not favored today. Double-check home security.

CANCER(June 21-July 22): Rise above petty jealousies, minor worries. Someone is working behind the scenes on your behalf. Be patient with a gossipy co-worker or relative.

LEO(July 23-Aug.22): Dealings with foreigners or attorneys are likely today. Unusual circumstances make you eager to get out of town. Temper your enthusiasm for a project with practicality.

VIRGO(Aug.23-Sept.22): You could feel under the gun, expected to produce too many miracles. Do your best and stay calm. The emphasis later today will be on expenses, loans and tax matters. Rely on experts.

LIBRA(Sept.23-Oct.22): Be more tactful and considerate around your colleagues. Jealousy could be the underlying cause of someone's irritability. Extra attention to details and directions will pay off. A waning relationship responds to tenderness.

SCORPIO(Oct.23-Nov.21): The financial advice of a well-intentioned friend may be based on a faulty perception. Study nutrition and look for ways to improve your diet. Be more flexible when dealing with loved ones.

SAGITTARIUS(Nov.22-Dec.21): Parents need to show understanding and patience when dealing with tiny tots. Make friendly overtures to someone who is down. Lunching at an "in" spot boosts morale.

CAPRICORN(Dec.22-Jan.19): A school friend could play a major role in your happiness. Remember to repay favors. A romantic relationship could confuse you. Postpone making a formal commitment if your doubts grow.

AQUARIUS(Jan.20-Feb.18): Authority figure will offer valuable backing, support. Professional advice turns out to be more to the point than you expected. Be alert when friends inquire about your personal finances. Probe their motives.

PISCES(Feb.19-March 20): Discretion pays off in both business affairs and domestic matters. Increased communication helps mend a longtime rift. Work done around the house will add to the value of your property.

start, and by the end of the singles competition, both teams were tied at three matches a piece. It was at this point that the Minutewomen decided to slam the door on their opponents. Springfield was swept in the three doubles matches.

"We played them close in the singles," mentioned Gentzler, "but when the doubles came around, we turned it up a notch and took them out. It wasn't even close."

Saturday's match with Central Connecticut was quite a different story. The score read 7-2 at the end of the day, but that was very misleading. Every game was close, but this was not meant to be the Minutewomen's day. Things began to fall apart right from the start, as Elyssa Rosenberg had to be scratched due to the flu.

"We had to make several changes," stated coach Gentzler. "People had to be moved up. They played in higher positions and did very well."

Amy Ryan was forced to play at fourth singles. She usually plays fifth. Unfortunetly, this was the only singles match in which UMass could muster up a win.

"They're a hot ball club, and were hard to stop," continued Gentzler. "Their number one singles won easily, but thats what I expected. I didn't think they would win five of the six singles matches."

Gentzler tried a new strategy in the doubles matches, by forming a new pair to play in the third spot. Allison Agnew and Lynn Gualtieri played better than could be expected for their first match. They won in straight sets, 7-5, 7-6 for the only other UMass victory.

"Basically, they're my bench," stated Gentzler. "Its nice to bring them into a game and have them score points. They played good doubles tennis. I liked that."

Men's cross country runs strong

By JON REIDEL
Collegian Staff

As usual, the Providence College men's cross country team easily outscored its opponent, this time on Friday in Storrs, Conn. with a perfect score of 15. But not without some unexpected early race pressure from the University of Massachusetts men's cross country team who took second place with 52 points followed by the University of Connecticut with 64.

With five Friars racing immediately to the front of the pack, the Minutemen responded by putting four of their own right with Providennce. The strategy kept the Minutemen within a realistic reach of the Friars, ranked fourth nationally, until just after three miles, the course's halfway point, where P.C. began to distance itself from the Minutemen.

"We sent four of our guys right out with them and we were hanging in, but at the halfway point, Providence just made too strong of a move and took over," UMass coach Ken O'Brien said.

Although the final score may not have been exactly what O'Brien wanted, the type of racing he saw from his squad couldn't have made him happier.

"We weren't aggressive enough in our first two races," said O'Brien, "but on Friday we went out much stronger. It was our best race by far. It gives us a good idea of our personality."

Individually, the Minutemen ran side-by-side, finishing with a pack of very close times, led by Joe Livorsi in seventh place in a time of 33:06. Livorsi had run two respectable races earlier in the year, but didn't run near his potential until Friday.

"Joe really ran well," said O'Brien. "It was good to see because we'll need more races from him like that in the future."

Only three seconds behind Livorsi was Jon Corso in eighth place, who after a bout with a virus at the time of the first meet, appears to be getting much stronger as the season progresses.

Following closely behind were seniors Art smith (11th place in a time of 33:19) and Herb Heffner (9th place in 33:11). Freshman Pat Ryan rounded out the UMass top five with a 17th place finish.

With the Eastern Collegiate Championships this coming Saturday, the Minutemen couldnt have chosen a better race to peak.

"As a team it was our best performance," said O'Brien. "We can beat a lot of teams if we can stay close together and keep running aggressively. We need to really claw and scratch if we want to do some damage."

Men's tennis continues to roll

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

What is the hottest fall sports team on campus? How about the University of Massachusetts men's tennis team.

Saturday the Minutemen extended their record to 6-1 with a 6-3 win over the University of Vermont at the Upper Boyden Courts.

"I couldn't ask them to do much more," said UMass coach Manny Roberts. "It was a good team effort."

No one match typified the whole event more than the number one singles showdown between UM's Barry Wadsworth and Vermont's Scott Stern. Wadsworth had bested Stern two weeks ago at the ECAC tournament in Albany, N.Y.

In this match, Stern jumped out to a quick lead, taking the first set, 6-1. But Wadsworth rallied to take the second set, 6-4, and then swept the final set, 6-0 for the win.

"He [Wadsworth] just proceeded to glide through the third set," Roberts said. "I don't think Stern was too happy with that. He was looking for revenge. Barry rose to the top, as he usually does."

Paul Audet lost at second singles, 6-2, 6-2, but freshmen Jeff Hechemy (6-2, 6-1) and Lloyd Teitelbaum (6-3, 6-2) put the Minutemen in good shape with victories. Teitelbaum and Wadsworth are both undefeated in singles play.

Rich Stone lost at number five, 6-3, 7-5, putting UMass up 3-2. Because of poor court conditions, the sixth singles had to be delayed until a court opened. When it did, Chris Johnson took a 6-4, 7-6 win, taking the tiebreaker, 7-5.

"It was 4-2, which is where we like to be after the singles," Roberts said.

Johnson and Teitelbaum lost at first doubles (6-4, 6-4), but the teams of Wadsworth and Audet (6-1, 6-2) and Hechemy and Stone (6-4, 7-6 [7-2]) closed the match out with wins.

"We knew it was going to be tough. Vermont was coming down with a purpose," Roberts said of how UMass beat the Catamounts at the ECACs. "The guys played as they have most of the season."

UMass makes up a match at New Hampshire Thursday and then finishes the season at Clark University on Saturday.

Sports notice

"Jerome just needs a little block and he's gone," David Mitchell said.

Rhody rallied for its only score on a 1-yard run by tailback Chris Poirier, before linebacker Mario Perry sealed the win with an 18-yard interception return. Linebackers Matt Tulley and Chris Tenkin had quarterback Steve Monaco lined up for a beating, and Monaco forced a pass into Perry's waiting arms.

Following the game, it was learned that Wilkos had suffered bruised ribs during the second half, but he is listed as the starter when the Minutemen visit Connecticut on Saturday.

Despite Wilkos' heroics, consensus dictated the win was really a matter of the whole team pulling it together.

"This is a great win. I'm excited about it. It gets us back on track," Chip Mitchell said.

"We got fired up, to finally be back at home after two weeks of frustrations," said center Al Pogarian. "There were a lot of positive things in this game."

"The whole team was sick of losing," said David Mitchell. "We had to take charge as a team."

That was precisely what Reid was looking for after two downers in a row.

"We were close to going in the tank, playing with no emotion and no excitement," Reid said. "We have the [Yankee Conference] beanpot, but we were playing like it's 100,000 miles away.

"I said 'let's play like we did when we got it. If we lose — fine. But let's play with emotion and have fun.'" Reid said. "The leaders came out today."

Wilkos, defense power Minutemen, 31-6

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

It was fitting on this Homecoming weekend that the University of Massachusetts football team from the not-so-distant past seemed to resurface Saturday at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

The option offense that guided the Minutemen to Yankee Conference championships in 1986 and '88 returned to the fold against the University of Rhode Island. Neither Tim Bryant nor Dave Palazzi, pilots of those title excursions, was at the helm this time. Instead, it was sophomore Gary Wilkos who gave the Minutemen (2-2-1, 1-2 in YC) a much-needed jumpstart.

Wilkos is a redshirt sophomore whose collegiate experience on Friday night had amounted to eight minutes of garbage time in last week's blowout at Boston University. The next day he made his first-ever start and orchestrated an exciting 31-6 win over Rhode Island before 10,102 alumni, parents and students alike.

"Last Sunday morning at 7 a.m. when I was reviewing the films of the [BU] game, I threw my pad on the floor and started screaming, yelling and kicking," UMass coach Jim Reid said. "I decided that if we're going to be lousy, we're going to do it the way we want, and that's to run and run the option."

With tailback Jerome Bledsoe tearing up the conference, part of the ingredients were there. Wilkos, a lanky type (6-foot-1, 175 pounds), lends the blend of strong arm and mobility that makes the option click. And it clicked on Saturday.

Even more fitting is that Wilkos (9-of-16, 147 yards) did it against the team that bird-dogged him most out of high school.

"We went with Gary right at the last minute, and we thought he was a thrower, but not very fast," Reid said. "Believe me, he's fast."

The doubters found that out on the first play from scrimmage. From the Ram 45, Wilkos ran an option left and kept it himself, legging it for 22 yards. In all, he totaled 75 yards on the run.

That dash set up Marco Gabrielli for a 39-yard field goal just three minutes into the game, and UMass was off and running. A rejuvented defense, with some adjustments, bashed heads with the Rams all game, and came up victorious more times than not.

"We went with a two-man line, and put all our experienced players on the field at the same time," Reid explained.

"The defense had to come out strong and shut them down. We set the tone," said nose guard Joe Cullen.

That done, Wilkos and Bledsoe kept it up on UMass' first touchdown drive. Starting from their own 16, Wilkos ran for 11 and then Bledsoe equaled that on two runs. After a sack, Wilkos churned out 24 more on a sweet draw keeper on second-and-16.

Then facing a third-and-20 after a sack and a pair of penalties, Wilkos nailed flanker Ron Blauvelt for a 39-yard hookup to the Ram 16. Three plays later, it was a 14-yard toss to Chip Mitchell in the left corner of the end zone that pushed the UMass lead to 10-0 with 7:33 left in the half.

After a URI punt into the end zone, Wilkos got another before halftime. With the ball on the 39, he stepped back and fired to flanker Mike Tobin on the left sideline. Cornerback Ricky Ford had him boxed out at the 30-yard line, but Tobin stepped inside, whisked the ball away and danced untouched across the goal line.

"I didn't know where he was. I was just going after the ball," Tobin said.

UMass falls one goal shy

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

For the second time this season, the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team had to settle for second place in a tournament. But in the grand scheme of things, the Reds got a win and a tie out of the weekend, which suits them just fine.

In the first-ever UMass Classic, the Reds played host to southerners Central Florida and Florida International, with New Hampshire along for the fun. UMass tied nationally-ranked Central Florida, 1-1 on Saturday and then topped FIU, 4-0 Sunday afternoon at Boyden Field.

"I'm very pleased with our effort," said UMass coach Jim Rudy. "I would have really liked the Central Florida win."

The Reds (8-2-2) could have had it, were it not for tournament MVP Karen Richter, who was stellar in the UCF net. She turned in some Richter-scale saves in helping her Golden Knights to the championship honors. UCF took the title by virtue of goals scored (six to UM's five), having beaten New Hampshire on Sunday, 5-0.

In Saturday's battle, UCF (6-1-2) got on the board first at the 32-minute mark when Tina Theis picked up a free kick that wasn't cleared and banged it past UMass goalkeeper Skye Eddy.

But UMass got it back just two minutes into the second half when junior Sue Gaudette took a pass from freshman Leanne Swartz and crossed it to the near post. Camped out there was sophomore Michele Woodside, who nudged it past Richter to tie the game.

UMass dominated after halftime, but Richter came up big time again and again to preserve the deadlock.

"She was ultimately the difference," Rudy said. "She had seven key saves in overtime, including two terrific full-stretch dives."

After the Knights had beaten UNH in the opener Sunday, UMass knew what it had to do, but couldn't put the young Golden Panthers of FIU (2-10) away. UMass squandered many a chance in the first half and led just 1-0 at the break.

"They pushed us forward and compacted us, and then we compacted ourselves," Rudy said. "That's exactly

Minutewomen shoot down Black Bears

Philbrick leads 9-0 onslaught with four goals

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

It is not too often that University of Massachusetts field hockey coach Pam Hixon can start emptying her bench in the opening minutes of the second half. But in Sunday's 9-0 win over the University of Maine, Hixon could afford that luxury.

With the Minutewomen out to a 4-0 halftime lead, Hixon had a rare chance to rest her starters and take a look at some of the younger players.

"I was really excited today, not because of the big score against Maine, but because our younger kids got in and played well," Hixon said.

Names such as freshman midfielder Joy Blenis and freshman forward Susan Bernegger, which would normally not show up on the field during game time, at least this year, were given significant playing time.

One of the older players also needed some work and made the most of her minutes Sunday. Junior forward Nancy Philbrick, who had been nursing a severe muscle pull, stepped in during junk time in the second half and proceeded to score four goals.

"Out of all my forwards, she (Philbrick) probably has the best natural touch on the ball," Hixon said.

Maine goalie Debrah McSweeney doesn't want to hear that. She found out the hard way as Philbrick tapped in goals at 4:41, 9:47, 14:48, and 28:50 of the second half to do some serious damage to McSweeney's goals-against average. Sophomore forward Dawn Trumbauer netted the other goal in the half at 27:15.

The starters earned their rest though in the first half, outshooting Maine 14-1 and cushioning the lead with goals by senior forward Kathy DeAngelis, who had the first two of the game at 2:26 and 16:00, junior Beth Thornton at 26:15 and senior Mara Frattasio at 32:59.

But Scott's biggest shutout of the weekend came on Saturday when she and the Minutewomen held junior All-American Jane Catanzaro and her Temple teammates scoreless to take a big 2-0 Atlantic 10 win over the Owls.

"We just came out firing. We really took control of the game early and really never let up," Hixon said. "We did what we had to do."

UMass, now 8-3-1 and 3-1 in the Atlantic 10 conference got goals from Frattasio five minutes into the game and Dawn Trumbauer with twenty minutes elapsed in the opening period. But the real hero of the day really was freshman midfielder Kathy Phelan who switched positions to mark Catanzaro, the Owl's leading scorer who had netted 19 goals in ten games. She would get nothing today though.

"Kathy Phelan was outstanding," Hixon said. "That was the first time she's ever played center back."

This weekend may also serve as a confidence booster to the UMass offense which has been stagnant as of late.

"People are starting to work together now," senior co-captain Kathy Derwin said. "We had a lot of combinations of two, three or four passes which is what we need. It's all coming together and it feels good."

Volleyball drops a pair

UMass falls to 1-10 on season

By DAN SARAZEN
Collegian Staff

Looking at the brighter side, the University of Massachusetts volleyball team made it home safely!

The Minutewomen lost at West Virginia Friday night three games to none; and then they traveled to Pittsburgh (which will ruin anyone's weekend) and dropped their match with Duquesne, also by the score of three games to none. Their record stands at 1-10.

"We did not have the best of weekends," said head coach Carol Ford. "We played well in spurts." But UMass was unable to maintain any form of consistency as the Minutewomen lost the first game 15-0. The Mountaineers, who are a good young team and beat Temple and Rutgers in their last two matches, cruised along in the next two games and walked away with the match 15-8 and 15-5.

The next afternoon the Minutewomen lost to Duquesne, which is now 4-10. "We had every intention of beating them." Ford said. "They're good but they're not great."

UMass lost the first game 3-15 and that forced coach Ford to make a move. "In the second game I took out the freshmen and put in some shorter players," Ford explained. "I just wanted desire."

At some levels the move did appear to pay off. Even though the Minutewomen lost the second game, they did it by the closest margin of the weekend, 13-15.

"The younger players are not playing up to their potential," said Ford. "There is not a fire, a will to win coming from these players."

Once again, good games were had by Nancy Sullivan and Julieta Santiago. "They can only do so much," Ford points out. As the season continues the question remains, how much of the responsibilty for winning are the younger players willing to take? "They (the younger players) have to show me they're competitors," Ford said.

Tonight the Minutewomen travel to Holy Cross and hope to liven things up. "They have taken games away from teams that have beaten us (U.R.I.)." said Ford. And as for what the freshmen have to do tonight, "They have to show me," Ford said.

Tennis splits over weekend

By C.J. ABATI

The University of Massachusetts women's tennis team split a pair of matches over the weekend. The team headed south to play Springfield College on Thursday afternoon, and came back with a 6-3 victory. Saturday, the Minutewomen faced Central Connecticut State University at the upper Boyden courts. Having the home court advantage didn't seem to help as Central Connecticut defeated UMass by a 7-2 score.

Springfield came into the match undefeated. The match lasted a gruelling five and a half hours, and was close throughout.

"They are a much better team now than they were last year," said UMass coach Edwin Gentzler. "Their top singles player from last year was playing in the third spot, and their number two player was out of the starting rotation in number eight."

The match was very close from the

Two Black students beaten

Director of Public Safety calls attacks 'racially motivated'

By SCOTT C. HILL
Collegian Staff

This weekend, two separate incidents of what University of Massachusetts police called "racial violence" against two Black students perpetrated by White men occurred on campus.

"Both incidents were definitely racially motivated," said Dr. Arthur Hilson, director of Public Safety.

Saturday at about 1:30 a.m., police responded to a call from witnesses who said they saw a freshman African-American student assaulted and beaten by three White men, who are not UMass students, outside the lobby of John Quincy Adams Residence Hall.

According to the student, he was leaving the lobby with a pizza when he was confronted by the three White men. The men demanded that the Black student give them the pizza, the student said. The student refused and was verbally assaulted and called "nigger," the student said. The student then verbally confronted the men and was beaten, he said.

When UMass police arrived at the scene, they took the Black student to University Health Services where he was treated for cuts and bruises and was X-rayed for a possible facial fracture, the student said.

Police gave the three men trespass notices and ordered them to leave campus.

One of the men will be summoned to appear at a show-cause hearing to determine if there is sufficient evidence for a charge of assault and battery based on the testimony of five White witnesses, Hilson said.

The second racial incident occured at about 2:30 a.m. on Thatcher Way in the Northeast Residdential Area.

According to UMass police, an African-American student was confronted by three White males, who are not UMass students, after they pulled up behind the African-American's vehicle and complained about his driving.

Police said a fight erupted and the African-American man was allegedly assaulted with a dangerous weapon, a shod foot. The student was thrown to the ground by the White men and repeatedly punched and kicked in the stomach, police said.

The three men will be summoned to appear at a show-cause hearing to determine if there is sufficient evidence for the charge of assault and battery with a dangerous weapon, police said.

The alleged assailants were apprehended later that night by UMass police when their vehicle was stopped for speeding, according to Hilson.

The driver was arrested and charged with driving without a license, police said. One of the passengers was also arrested on an outstanding warrant from the Framingham police, according to police records.

UMass racism: some history

The following is a partial chronology of racial harrassment at the University of Massachusetts:

OCTOBER 27, 1986

UMass is the scene of a racial clash in the Southwest Residential area that injured 10 students after the final game of the 1986 World Series. A 19-year-old African-American student, a UMass junior, is beaten unconscious during the brawl. He suffers leg and neck injuries.

Six White students are charged in the brawl, which involved some 2,000 people. They plead no contest to charges of assault and rioting and had their cases continued without a finding for one year.

MAY 16, 1987

All public activities at Theta Chi fraternity are suspended by the University pending investigation of a weekend fight at the fraternity in which two African-American students are attacked by White students.

FEBRUARY 9, 1988

Three UMass students, two African-American men and one White woman, file applications for complaints of assault in Hampshire District Court. They are seeking assault charges against six White people in what is being called a racial attack during a dormitory party over the weekend.

Vandals thrash new police car

By BETH GATELY
Collegian Staff

A new, $18,000 police car that was placed in storage in the Physical Plant this fall was vandalized Saturday morning, police said.

The four tires were slashed, a window and the light bar was smashed, resulting in $2,500 damage to the car, police said.

Police said they have suspects in the case because of evidence left at the scene.

Dr. Arthur Hilson, director of public safety, said the car was put in storage at the beginning of the semester to save money because of state budget constraints.

There is not enough money in the public safety coffers to make the necessary repairs on the police car, he said.

Hilson said he was considering using the car this semester to aid the Student Escort Service, now financially strapped because of budget cuts.

Some $67,000 was cut from the UMass Public Safety budget this semester, severely curtailing budgets for several programs, Hilson said in a previous interview.

The escort service has been a point of concern recently because of long waiting lists for escorts across campus.

Hilson said $16,000 is still needed to bring the program back on par with last year's level, which included three walking escorts and a car.

This semester the service is operating through only one van.

ANC leaders to be released

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP) — President F. W. de Klerk today said that six African National Congress leaders will soon be freed but that Nelson Mandela is not among them.

De Klerk said the formalities may take some time, but all the men had served many years and were quite old.

The guerrilla leaders were among eight prisoners the government said would soon be released. They were sentenced to life in prison along with Mandela in 1964.

The announcement, read on government-run television, said that Mandela's own release "is not now on the agenda."

The most prominent of the prisoners to be released is Walter Sisulu, 77, who ran day-to-day operations of the African National Congress as its secretary-general from 1949-54, when the government ordered him to resign.

Sisulu was imprisoned for life in June 1964 along with the other leaders of the guerrilla group's internal military wing.

Protester arrested

About 15 people who were protesting Saturday Department of Defense financed research at the University of Massachusetts disrupted a groundbreaking ceremony for a new engineering research building, police said.

Police said the protesters were seen attempting to pull down a tent set up for the ceremony near Marcus Hall. When police arrived, the group fled and the tent remained standing, police said.

Police made one arrest: Emily Katz, 21, of Northampton on charges of tresspassing after a written notice.

Katz, a former student at Hampshire College, was band from campus last spring after she was arrested in Memorial Hall with other members of People for a Socially Responsible University for protesting DOD-financed research at UMass.

Agricultural fraternity not just a bunch of farmers

By JAMES COHEN
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts has its origins in the agricultural field — its inception at a period in American history when people were still deeply connected to the agrarian form of life.

Now, a century later, America has been industrialized and computerized, and what has happened to those in the agricultural profession?

They still exist, but they have been nudged aside by other fields of study.

With few students choosing to study under departments such as Food Science and Natural Resources, there is the possibility of students in that field who feel intimidated.

One of the bright spots in such a position is Alpha Zeta fraternity, said Meghan Hopkins, a senior Animal Science major and a member of AZ.

AZ is a co-educational, academically oriented fraternity designed to involve students who are pursuing the same course of agrarian study upon which this University was founded, Hopkins said.

"A lot of the land-grant schools are getting pushed out. When people think of UMass they think of engineering or CASIAC," she said. "It would be nice if people were more aware of Food and Natural Resources."

The organization, which was established nationwide at the turn of the 20th century, is based on a two-fold observation in 1897 that the image of agriculture was at an extremely low point, and that there was a need for leadership in the field.

Hopkins said it is the intent of AZ to provide students in agricultural fields with a familiar foothold at the University and make the public aware that they are not just farmers, she said.

AZ helps students "make contacts, meet people, and improve their resumes. Big names like Cornell [University] and Penn look for Alpha Zeta," Hopkins said.

But, she added, "Alpha Zeta is not here just to improve job resumes. A person must be well-rounded."

Hopkins said AZ serves as a community service group as well as providing a support group for its own members. For instance, last year the fraternity was involved in assisting the Amherst Shelter. This year it is helping to organize the Hands Across Campus effort, which is scheduled for Civility Day, Oct. 27, from noon until 1 p.m.

Hopkins said the many facets of AZ illustrate its commitment to becoming more than a campus fraternity.

"Alpha Zeta is not a farming fraternity, it includes members of HRTA, forestry, and wildlife, and animal research," among others, she said.

Hopkins said AZ is not an honor society or a social fraternity, rather it is an honorary professional service fraternity combining the qualities of high academics and sound character.

It is preferred, but not mandatory, that prospective members are in the top 25 percent of their graduating class. They must also be in sophomore year of undergraduate studies.

Only members of Food and Natural Resources and Stockbridge may pledge AZ, she said.

There is no Alpha Zeta house on campus, but there will be an information session in Paige 202, which is located west of Marcus Hall, Wednesday at 6 p.m.

Abortion debate has new twist

By KATERI WALSH
Collegian Staff

Whoever said comedy doesn't belong in the realm of serious debate has not met the women of Sleeveless Theatre.

The Amherst-based theater troupe of five women will add a new perspective to the abortion debate in their pro-choice comedy "Womb for Rent, or How the Bimbos Against Women Ruin a Perfectly Good Night of Theatre."

"Too many people underestimate the power of a good laugh," said founding member Lisa Channer yesterday. But she added,
"It's really important for people to know that none of us think that the issue of abortion is funny. I feel that it's one of the most crucial things going on in the world today."

The play, in which the five women collaborated on the writing, directing, and performing, will kick off a tour of the Northeast with its premier Thursday and Friday night in Northampton. The play includes some of the history of abortion debates, including this summer's Supreme Court decision.

"It's two hours of insanity," Channer said, adding, "If we don't get a chance to laugh about what's going on we're just going to explode."

Everyone in the play has a strong theatrical background, Channer said, including herself and Futtner, who are both graduates of the University of Massachusetts theater department. Channer and Futtner are also members of the Springfield chapter of the National Organization for Women.

"Because we're coming from a political place just as much as a theatrical one, it's very important to us that we get a lot of information out," Futtner said. "At the same time, we really are managing to pull it off without being too didactic."

"We all really believe in what we're doing," Channer said. "I think that's what it comes down to."

The play will run at 8 p.m. Thursday and Friday at the Northampton Center for the Arts. Tickets are on a sliding scale from $5 to $7. Reservations can be made by calling 586-7282.

Trees don't think politically

"Only you," advises Smokey the Bear, "can prevent forest fires." In the realm of most forest fires, Smokey speaks the truth. Except when lightning is involved, most infernos can be traced to carelessness — a smoldering cigarette butt tossed in a pile of leaves, or a campfire gone wacko.

Darren Garnick

But whether nature or human error is blamed for a blaze, the cause is usually considered either unavoidable or accidental. Seldom are thousands of trees deliberately scorched to the ground. For when a nature reserve is reduced to ashes, no one smiles.

Well, almost no one. In the madcap, zany Middle East, there are people who destroy trees for the sheer joy of it. Using the forest fire as a publicity stunt, politically motivated arsonists have struck fear in the hearts of Israeli wildlife.

In 1988, Palestinian extremists set dozens of fires in Israel to express solidarity with the Intifadah. This year, the Intifadah's Arson Committee has stepped up the campaign. On September 19-20, their efforts blossomed, creating what the Israeli environmental minister calls "the biggest ecological tragedy" Israel has ever suffered.

Ignited simultaneously from five separate locations, the flames consumed at least 1,400 acres of Mount Carmel National Park, or about 250,000 trees. Several animal casualties were reported at the nearby Hai Bar wildlife sanctuary. According to The Jerusalem Post, "several Palestinian gangs" proudly claimed responsibility.

Death to the Zionist trees! Death to the Jewish chlorophyll!

Trees have no political opinions. Trees are not influenced by the ideologies of their planters. To my knowledge, the Carmel forest has neither endorsed nor condemned the Intifadah.

Zionism, Palestinian nationalism, Likud, Labor, the PLO, etc., are of no concern to the average tree. Trees care primarily about converting carbon dioxide into oxygen. For years, the Middle Eastern tree community has provided this service — free of charge — to both Israeli and Palestinian lungs. And how are these trees thanked?

With their demise.

The political wisdom of burning down this forest is ludicrous. Whatever short-term satisfaction the arsonists expect to gain is bound to backfire. Like Tel Aviv, Jerusalem, Haifa, and the rest of Israel, Palestinian nationalists hope to occupy Mount Carmel someday.

What use will the land have if they have already destroyed it?

Take a look at this scenario: Two bitter enemies, X and Y, are crawling in the desert in a desperate search for water. Neither has consumed any liquid during the last 43 hours and will surely soon die of dehydration. Miraculously, out of nowhere, a refrigerated water cooler appears. Enemy X reaches the cooler first, but fearing Y will get there soon, takes a vial of poison from her pocket and empties it into the water — before either of them has taken a drink. "Ha! Ha!" she says to Y, "Now you will die of thirst!"

It is this type of mentality that plagues the Middle East. Both sides cling stubbornly to selfish extremes — and both sides will die doing so.

Israel is shattering agricultural myths. Myths like "trees won't grow in the desert," and "deserts only expand, they can not be shrunk." Methods to grow food where no food is supposed to grow are tremendously needed, and Israeli scientists may soon discover them.

But in Israel's battle to beat the desert dust into submission, there are the arsonists fighting on the desert's side. The arsonists responsible for the Carmel disaster will eventually be caught and sentenced to prison.

Big deal.

The trees are gone — 250,000 of them. The only hope now is to start planting new trees. And wait another 40 years.

Volunteer for the Escort Service

I've been following the ongoing saga about the Escort Service and a thought occured to me.

Presently the Escort Service consists of one van taking people across campus. The University has no shortage of vehicles; even if they had to steal one from the botany department, the problem is money to pay for drivers. So then it hit me — volunteers. Why can't people offer one night a week or even a month to drive a van with the Escort Service?

By now you might be saying, "Mike, no one is going to volunteer to drive a van around every night!" I've learned that once people get something on their mind, they try to do something about it.

Right now there is probably someone thinking, "Hey, here is an original idea! Let's have a sit-in at Whitmore to protest the cutting of the escort service's budget!" Instead of doing something like that, why don't we channel some of that energy into really doing something.

I personally don't have much time at night, but I would volunteer some of the free time that I do have. Even if there were not that many volunteers it wouldn't be that bad.

Maybe some nights we'd have two vans going and others only one. Some is better than none.

If there were enough volunteers out there it might even be possible to reinstate the walking escort. If you have been complaining about the budget cuts for the Escort Service, and you really care, why not do something about it?

" THANK YOU, GEORGE!"

What is academic freedom?

I got involved in People for a Socially Responsible University (PSRU) to do my part in not cooperating with certain policies of the U.S. government.

It is immoral that 70 percent of all federal dollars allocated for research and development is eaten up by the Department of Defense (DoD).

Peter Sakura

Where does the money come from?

It comes from agencies that give loans and grants to this country's students. It comes from agencies that try to study and clean up the environment. It comes from agencies that provide food and housing for people who need it. I think the DoD's "freedom" to increase their military capabilities is less important than our freedom to go to classes, our freedom to swim in an ocean free of pollutants, our freedom to eat and have a roof over our head.

Chancellor Duffey says that the DoD has a right to conduct war research on this campus in the name of academic freedom. Contrary to his claims, academic freedom does not exist on this campus. As more military money pours into UMASS, more civilian money is sucked out. Say good-bye to our academic freedom as the budgets for the following are cut back or eliminated: libraries; University Without Walls; the Everywoman's Center; freshmen and transfer admissions; courses; faculty and staff; escort and emergency telephone services; and 1000 course sections. This is the academic freedom we should care about.

Contrary to Mr. Duffey's claims, academic freedom does not exist in this society. Academia is not free because it depends on money. If a researcher wants to study something that is not funded—like solar energy research or peace studies—then he or she is simply not free to conduct that research. This is an example of the fact that one has freedom in this country only if one has the money.

Furthermore, academic freedom does not exist in a vacuum. Things called morals and a conscience come into the picture. The Reagan administration overfunded the DoD in part by cutting back other parts of the federal budget. For instance, under Reagan two million units of affordable housing that were going to be built were cut. That kind of sacrifice is too great to justify the DoD's "academic freedoms."

Since when has the military had rights to this country's universities? Colleges and universities were off-limits to the military for over three hundred years until World War II when the military and academia agreed to work together toward the war effort. Only the war ended and the military stayed on campus — and remains now. At UMASS DoD funding has increased 2000 percent in the last decade so that now one society is changing from the humanistic Athens of ancient Greece to militaristic Sparta.

Our country's priorities must be critically examined and changed. Does it make sense for UMASS to develop automated tanks while so many people are homeless? Does it make sense for UMASS to plan a biological warfare attack while 20 million Americans — many of them children — are too poor to buy enough food? On a more direct note, does it make sense that war research receives thousands of times more funding than peace research, the study of peaceful means of conflict resolution?

I support PSRU not because I am against academic freedom. I cherish the academic freedom of civilian education more than the academic freedom to do war research. It is not a matter of censorship, it is a matter of wanting to change our priorities. Therefore, I support economic conversion. Mr. Duffey's "academic freedom" argument does not justify DoD-funded research. DoD-funded research endangers academic freedom.

UMass police — more enlightened than average cops

I originally intended to write this column about how yet another Dukakis appointee is working within the system to undermine the long term viability of public higher education, but the Paul Tsongas story will have to wait, because something more important came up.

The other night, right here on campus, a woman was threatened and verbally abused by her boyfriend.

The police arrived, and as she started to explain what happened, her boyfriend suddenly reappeared. She was scared, mostly because she didn't think the police would believe her. The boyfriend acted casually and said nothing was wrong.

When the woman told the police that the boyfriend never actually hit her, I thought they would give him a short but stern lecture and head back to Dunkin' Donuts.

Fifteen years ago, my mother tried to report a similar situation and the police wanted evidence of physical abuse, like broken bones or at least bruises.

Without physical injuries, my hometown police would not do anything. Depending on who you ask; police response to domestic abuse generally ranges from complacency to complicity.

But sometimes things are better here on campus.

These officers treated everyone involved with the utmost respect, calmly and professionally told the boyfriend to leave, and said if he was found anywhere on campus again, he would go to jail. They took every possible precaution to make sure the woman was safe, at least for as long as she stayed here.

Al Arpad

Nobody who has ever tried to park a car or drink a beer on campus could completely see eye-to-eye with the police. Some of the regulations they have to enforce are bound to bring them into conflict with young people.

Nevertheless, the University police are among the best trained, most professional around.

Most institutions, like the police, are more enlightened at the University than anywhere else.

The whole community is characterized by a vision for the future which, though fragmented and imperfect, is wholly superior to the vision of, for example, the business community.

At the beginning of this semester, Chancellor Duffey said "I cannot see a great deal of benefit in turning to business leaders as our chief consultants. They are notoriously bad in understanding their own self interests when it comes to public policy."

He was referring, of course, to the recent activities of the Chair of the Board of Regents of Higher Education, Paul Tsongas, who I almost didn't get a chance to write about this week.

Paul Tsongas has spent most of the past year pandering shamelessly to business groups associated with the tax-cutting movement in a misguided effort to enlist their support for a hazy but nevertheless frightening vision of public higher education.

Under the competitive regimen prescribed by the business community, there is clearly no money for institutional luxuries.

Most likely there will soon be no money for police training above and beyond the standards of other communities.

Campus security works to fight administrative budget cuts

Hilson seeks alternatives

By SARAH DEMASTER
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts needs to make security a higher priority, said Director of Public Safety Arthur Hilson.

A $67,000 cut in funds in public safety means that Hilson must juggle his resources between housing and building security and the escort service.

"Someone needs to look at how we spend our money," Hilson said. "For example, money is spent on recruitment of basketball players."

"Don't get me wrong," he said. "[Recruiting] is wonderful, but the security of the campus is equal to if not more important than the quality of the basketball team."

> 'I am committed to providing an escort service, come hell or high water.'
> – UMass Director of Public Safety Arthur Hilson

The Department of Public Safety includes the police department and the security department. The security department is responsible for housing and building security, the escort service, and community disorders, he said.

Last year, UMass had 14 security guards to check buildings to make sure they are locked, and to escort students across campus, between 3 p.m. and 7 a.m.

This year, because of a hiring freeze imposed by the state, the number of security guards has been cut in half.

"Seven people must provide security seven nights a week," he said. "We try not to bring in anyone to cover unless we absolutely have to," noting he must pay them time and a half.

One of the programs affected by this cutback is the escort service, which now uses a van to transport students across campus.

Carol Radzik, director of building security, said there have been a lot of delays in service as a result.

"For the dispatchers, it's a sad thing to tell people there'll be a wait," she said.

Hilson said he is determined to solve the problem.

"I am committed to providing an escort service, come hell or high water," he said.

He said one alternative is to use some of the security officers who now patrol buildings at night as escorts.

"I now have to reduce security in our buildings," he said. "I can't afford to keep them there."

Hilson said he is also going to advocate that all academic buildings be closed at midnight.

Hilson said he has also met with Student Government Association President Tracy Davis to discuss contributions from student government to the Department of Public Safety.

Davis said the SGA is still looking into possible sources.

She added that Sigma Phi Epsilon has offered its services as escorts, but that it is often hard to get other people to donate their time.

"The most time [from escorts] is needed near exam times," she said.

Radzik said she agreed with Davis that a volunteer escort service is difficult to run.

"We had one about seven years ago," she said. "But each semester, the program wouldn't start until about October," because of the time needed to bring in and train volunteers.

Radzik said another problem is that volunteers have no accountability.

"If they have an exam or don't show up, what can you do?" she said.

Hilson said the cuts have not only forced him to reduce certain programs, but they have enhanced existing staffing problems.

"I still have to deal with a police department that I contend is smaller than the campus deserves," he said. "One officer to every 670 students is a lousy ratio."

He is making a request for 10 more police officers, he said.

Despite the reduction in services, Hilson said he has had no reports of rapes, attempted rapes or indecent assault and battery.

However, he added he hopes it won't take an incident like the 1986 rape and murder of Lehigh University freshman Jeanne Clery to make people aware of the lack of services.

Radik said students themselves can help tighten security as well, by cooperating with student security workers.

"[Student receptionists] get hassled for asking for an ID," she said.

She added, "We are constantly unpropping doors."

UMass senior Jim Dougherty, a security supervisor, said he agrees propped open doors is a major problem on campus.

"It's kind of a joke to sneak your buddies in," he said. "Students here don't want security unless it's convenient."

Hilson said he agrees students should be more aware of the danger they put themselves in by propping doors open.

"We don't have barricades on this campus; anyone can walk in," he said. "We cannot assume that everyone will be as honest as you are."

Campus crime: a student concern

By KERRY HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

Jeanne Clery, a Lehigh University student was brutally beaten, raped and murdered in April of 1986. She wasn't walking late at night in a dimly lit area or at a wild party. She was in her own dormitory room.

Unfortunately, according to the Center for the Study and Prevention of Campus Violence at Towson State University in Maryland, the number of violent crimes — including robbery, aggravated assault, rape and murder — amount to approximately 1,990 on the nation's college campuses.

These figures also take into account the fact that almost 90 percent of U.S. colleges do not report crime statistics, according to a recent Reader's Digest survey.

Many students at the University of Massachusetts think that although the UMass campus is fairly safe, statistics and horror stories such as these prove students can't be too sure.

Sarah, a UMass sophomore who preferred to use a pseudonym to protect her identity, was a victim of sexual harassment in her own room. As she was sleeping earlier this semester, a drunk man entered her unlocked room, waking her up as he tried to get into her bed.

Sarah said although she was not attacked, the experience was very upsetting.

"I think it took something like that [being sexually harassed], to make me realize that you aren't really that safe anywhere," Sarah said. "A drunk is a drunk and education is not going to change that."

Sarah added that many students rationalize when thinking about being attacked late at night.

"You say to yourself when you are walking from point A to point B, 'It won't happen to me this time,' when it can. Denial is playing a big role here," Sarah said.

Leila Habib, a Sylvan resident, thinks that more security should be provided around campus.

"In the dorms, I think that the security is fine. But I think that there should be a larger security around campus from about 5 p.m. on, because it's starting to get dark early," Habib said.

Habib added that when she walked by herself from Southwest to Sylvan several nights ago at 2 a.m., she felt vulnerable.

"It was a terrifying experience because it was so lonely. I walked for about 20 minutes without seeing one cop car," Habib said.

Theft is also a concern for students at UMass. Freshman Steve MacDonald said, "I wouldn't leave my things for long periods of time . . . [well,] maybe to go down the hall. Any real criminal could steal whatever he wanted."

Several students said that they feel the budget cuts have had a severe effect on UMass security.

Sarah commented, "Security here looks good on the outside. We have an escort service, some lighted paths and some emergency phones, but relative to a school of this size it is not adequate."

Medieval movie is memorable

By GEORGE LENTZ
Collegian Correspondent

Every once in a while, a film comes out of nowhere and catches you completely by surprise. Vincent Ward's The Navigator is one of the most daringly original and visually stunning films released in quite some time.

Set in the dark year of 1348, the Black Plague is devastating Europe, sweeping across the continent like an ominous cloud. In a tiny Cumbrian village, the inhabitants hide underground, deep within the mine shafts in a desperate attempt to escape the plague. It is here that the visions of young Griffin, played with remarkable aplomb by Hamish McFarlane, hold all hope of survival for the entire village.

Besieged with visions, Griffin convinces the villagers that survival lies in placing a spire on the steeple of a distant cathedral on the other side of the earth, before the dawn of the next day. Left with no other choice, they follow him down the mine shaft, and when they tunnel through, they emerge in Aukland, New Zealand, in the year 1988.

This spellbinding little film sparks of the same flavor that made Terry Gilliam's Time Bandits and The Adventures of Baron Munchausen such memorable experiences.

Vincent Ward shot the film in both black-and-white and color, using the black-and-white to draw heavily on the devastating impact of the plague. It establishes an effective move, giving the film a mystical, gothic quality. When the villagers break through to 1988, the film switches over to color, emphasizing the glow of the city lights, an image of celestial beauty to the villagers who believe they have tunneled into "God's city."

The film is full of religious symbolism, with its images of hellish Europe and heavenly Aukland, but Ward manages to keep it under control without being pretentious and preachy. The Navigator is by no means a modern parable.

In its purest form, the film is a moving and touching fable of hope and trust; a doomed village wanting to find reality in the dreams of a young boy who takes them on a transcendental journey via the power of his narration. The urgency of its delivery and the desperation of its listeners ultimately makes Griffin's vision a reality.

The Navigator is an enchanting piece of filmmaking, a film that dares to be original and innovative in an industry marred with banality.

Ward has proven himself an effective storyteller in the tradition of Frank Capra and Steven Spielberg, while maintaining the creative genius of such directors as Terry Gilliam and Tim Burton. Ward doesn't simply make movies, he generates a feeling and creates a mood that gives way to a world that blurs that thin line separating dream from reality.

The film is currently playing at the Pleasant Street Theater in Northampton, and will only be there until Thursday of this week. If you're sick and tired of Hollywood's commercial, generic entertainment, I strongly urge you to see this film before it leaves the area. It's one of the year's best.

NOTES

Expected at Pleasant Street Theater this week is the new Burt Reynolds film, Breaking In. Directed by Bill Forsythe (Housekeeping, Local Hero) and scripted by John Sayles (Matewan, The Return of the Secaucus Seven, Eight Men Out), Reynolds plays an aging safecracker who takes a young crook under his wing. Reynolds hasn't had a good film since John Boorman's Deliverance, and that was over 15 years ago, but with Sayles providing his lines and Forsythe telling him what to do, Reynolds should finally be back on his feet again.

Expected to open elsewhere in the area this week is Steve Kloves' The Fabulous Baker Boys. Starring Beau and Jeff Bridges, the film follows the down-and-out career of 2 lounge room pianists who finally rejuvenate their act and their lives with the addition of a call-girl turned singer (Michelle Pfieffer).

Woody Allen's Crimes and Misdemeanors, the nineteenth movie he has written and directed, is opening in Boston this week. Written by and starring Allen, the storyline of the film has been kept secret, although it has been said it will mark Allen's return to comedy after 2 dismal outings with the dramas September and Another Woman. The film also stars Martin Landau, Mia Farrow (of course) and Angelica Huston. Hopefully the film will open up in the area sometime before the end of the semester.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

HAPPY BIRTHDAY! IN THE NEXT YEAR OF YOUR LIFE: The material gains you make now will last a lifetime. Success in career and financial areas comes through knowing the right people. Look for a promotion and raise after Jan. 1. A new romantic relationship gives you a big lift in early spring. Those who find themselves suddenly single will enjoy their new independence even if they feel lonely at times. Focus on long-term investments next summer. A former classmate could play a major role in your future happiness.

CELEBRITIES BORN ON THIS DATE: first lady Eleanor Roosevelt, actor Ron Leibman, cosmetics magnate Charles Revson, singer Dottie West.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): You heave a sigh of relief concerning a personal relationship. A partnership or marriage could be involved. Stick to conventional methods in business to earn respect of authority figure.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Face up to your family obligations. Something you thought lost forever can be retrieved. Lay your cards on the table when discussing the future with your romantic partner.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): A long-awaited break could suddenly arrive. Additional revenue is possible from artistic endeavors. Consult an expert about the proper amount to charge for services. Do not sell yourself short!

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Look for a new way to assign or handle chores. Small-fry should be praised for their efforts. Let romantic partner know where you are coming from and where you are headed.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): A daydream can be realized with hard work and patience. You receive valuable hints from an older or more experienced person. Anything new attracts you. Plan to make certain changes in your weekday routine.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): You make a happy but startling discovery. Share it only with trusted friends. Romance enjoys favorable influences. Do not try to call all the shots. Loved one could be in a sensitive mood.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Do not rely on others bailing you out of a dilemma. Start new projects on your own. A hobby or avocation could lead to a search for new employment soon.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Professional recognition will boost your self-confidence. An attractive member of the opposite sex plays a key role in future plans. Follow your hunches. The mail brings a check or financial tips. Take advice on how to save time and money. Your social life accelerates.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Set some new goals and back your words with deeds. Meet all deadlines to preserve your reputation for reliability. Someone who sings your praises could be secretly jealous. Show more discretion.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Resist the temptation to force the issue where someone's affections are involved. Focus attention on your job. Conscientious effort brings tangible rewards. Take compliments with a grain of salt.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Too many details could hamper work in progress. Simplify your methods. Arguing is futile when someone refuses to listen to reason. Reassess your program; find the means to make it work.

Minutewomen take two out of three after losing to third-ranked Providence

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Correspondent

Coach Julie LaFreniere got exactly what she expected in terms of results in last Friday's quad-meet at the University of Connecticut. UMass lost 15-54 to powerhouse Providence College and beat UConn 54-72 and Brown 54-91. A closer examination of the meet reveals causes for both optimism and concern.

Providence College, which took the top five spots in the meet, is ranked third in the nation. Alas, life at the top is tough, as PC isn't even No. 1 in the East, taking a backseat to Villanova.

After PC's onslaught, UMass senior captain Shana Smith grabbed sixth place overall, in a time of 19:12. Outstanding freshman Maureen Meldrim finished ninth at 19:46, with junior Laura LaVallee rounding out the top ten in 19:49.

"I'm extremely pleased with the performance of our top four runners; after that we were a little bit weak," said LaFreniere.

Perhaps one of the most positive aspects of the meet was the performance of sophomore Michelle St. Laurent, who finished 14th overall (20:12). "Michelle ran an outstanding race," LaFreniere said. "She's had a tendency to go out hard and fade, so we're working on the second half of her race. This was the best she's ran."

The rest of the Minutewomen's top seven were sophomore Precious Hill (15th, 20:15), freshman Becky Johnson (21st, 20:27), and junior Kathy Holt (22nd, 20:31).

"We've got to move Precious and Becky up with Maureen and Laura, and hopefully get Precious running with Shana by the end of the season," LaFreniere said. "If we don't have five people up near the top, we're going to be in trouble."

Johnson has been hampered by a sprained ankle which she suffered earlier in the season. "Becky lost some time because of the ankle brace she was wearing," said LaFreniere. "She just didn't look the same as she did earlier in the season."

Johnson has begun to show improvement, providing encouragement for the team. "She took off her ankle brace, and she feels a lot better. She's right back up near the top in practice," LaFreniere said.

UMass lost some depth as a result to injuries to junior Kathy Crocker and sophomore Tara Hughes, both of whom sat out of the meet. Crocker was suffering from sprained ligaments in her hip, and Hughes was nursing a sprained ankle. Both should be back for the important quad-meet against rival Vermont, UNH, and URI this Saturday.

Overall, LaFreniere is positive about the future. "We're a better team than the results now. I worked the kids hard in practice right up until the meet — we're aiming for October 14th against Vermont," said LaFreniere.

Baldacci quits after demotion

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

In the wake of the recent quarterback shake-up, fifth-year senior Roger Baldacci has quit the University of Massachusetts football team.

UMass coach Jim Reid refused to comment on it, saying only that "it's a personal matter between Roger and myself." Baldacci could not be reached for comment last night.

Baldacci, from Swampscott, had started the first four games this season for the 2-2-1 Minutemen before being replaced in the starting lineup by redshirt sophomore Gary Wilkos. Wilkos led UMass to a 31-6 win over Rhode Island Saturday.

After he failed to show up for practice Monday, Baldacci was suspended by Reid for violating team rules. Later that day, Baldacci met with Reid and announced his intentions.

The UMass-UConn Bruised Ribs Saga, Part II: Last season, Connecticut quarterback Matt DeGennaro was in limbo for the UMass game after suffering bruised ribs the weekend before. DeGennaro proceeded to play anyway and picked the Minutemen apart in a 35-14 Homecoming spoiler at the Stadium.

Last Saturday, Wilkos was taken to Health Services with . . . bruised ribs. He's been listed as probable for this weekend's clash with . . . UConn, in Storrs, Conn.

Wilkos was part of the "blue-shirt" squad during yesterday's practice, held out of drills because of his injury.

More from the local M*A*S*H unit: Flanker Ron Blauvelt was also out of practice yesterday with a bad ankle suffered during the second half against Rhode Island. He, too, is listed as probable for Saturday.

Nose guard Joe Cullen continues to nurse a sore ankle, but should play Saturday. Defensive tackle John Creamer, who suffered a dislocated knee on the first defensive play of the season against James Madison, is practicing and could see action as well.

Around the Yan Con: What has happened to Richmond? Jim Marshall's Spiders got blasted again, this time at home against Boston University, 35-0.

Speaking of Richmond, if you thought the four-overtime game of 1987 was bad, how about Villanova and UConn slugging it out for six this past weekend. Host Villanova pulled it out, 41-35, which won't leave the Huskies in a good mood for the UMass game.

New Hampshire pulled one out of the fire, rallying from a 28-6 deficit with 16 minutes left to top Northeastern, 31-28. Delaware lost to Bill and Mary, 27-24, and . . . in the Bowzer of the Week category, Maine managed to suck it up and nip Division II doormat Lock Haven, 56-0.

Men's soccer shutout, 1-0

By ADRIENNE MATT

The weather was crisp, not wet. The team spirit was present, not wanting. Yet despite these things, the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team was not able to pull off a victory, as they met with a 1-0 loss to the University of Rhode Island Saturday afternoon.

UMass entered the game after an apathetic 3-2 loss to Brown University earlier in the week. The Minutemen are currently 2-8-1 for the season. URI was trying to shake off a 4-0 shutout against Rutgers as they faced UMass. URI is now 5-5-1.

The emotion that was absent in the game against Brown, came alive against URI. URI was so persitent in playing tough, they rarely played the ball, as exhibited by fouls committed (18). The referees' personal vendettas were manifested in the amount and timing of both yellow and red cards distributed to URI players. Senior Gianni Romeo and freshman Corey Sullivan received yellow cards. Freshman David DeMello first received a yellow card and then was later expelled from the game with a red card. UMass committed 16 fouls and received no cards.

"I witnessed a good team effort," said head coach Jeff Gettler. "We played with intensity."

The only goal of the game came early, 15 minutes into regulation. In a Ram offensive attack, Sullivan scored assisted by classmate Peter DeSantos. Neither UMass nor URI were able to penetrate each other's defense to score again.

"We couldn't solve our scoring opportunities. We didn't finish our chances," said Gettler. "However, there was a better defensive effort."

Polo robbed by MIT, 12-9

By JOHN STEVEN MARPLE
Collegian Staff

Sometimes it's not so much the opponent you're fighting, sometimes it's the people in black and white. The referees.

Such was the case last Saturday as the University of Massachusetts water polo team lost to MIT 12-9. According to coach Russ Yarworth, the refereeing cost UMass the game.

"The ref was so biased and unfair we were never given a chance to win," he said.

The man in question, referee Phil Atkinson, has had confrontations with Yarworth in the past. "I played against him and he's an old nemesis of mine," said Yarworth.

The stats back up Yarworth's statements. UMass was charged with 11 kickouts while MIT had only three. In the third quarter the Minutemen had 11 possessions and lost ten of them on calls by Atkinson.

As for the game itself, UMass was led as usual by Jon Miller, who scored three goals and goalie Todd Larson, who churned out ten saves.

The Minutemen travel to the Naval Academy on Friday to do battle with Bucknell. If UMass is victorious, it will play the winner of the Brown vs. Washington & Lee game.

"The Bucknell game is a must for us," said Yarworth. "It's fair to say that our season hinges on this one game."

Minutemen take to the Hill against Division 3 Williams

By ADRIENNE MATT
Collegian Staff

Today at 3 p.m. the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team will meet Williams College on the Hill. Head coach Jeff Gettler and his troops hope to meet Williams with the same vigor with which URI was met this past weekend. The Minutemen are currently 2-8-1 for the season and hold the least desirable position in the Atlantic 10 East.

Williams is ranked 2nd in Division III New England men's soccer. To date, they hold an impressive 40-3 win-loss record in the last few years. They are currently 6-1, their only loss being to 6th ranked Division II Springfield (1-0). Victories included Hamilton College (5-0), Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute (2-0), Middlebury College (4-1), North Adams State College (1-0), Clark University (2-0) and Trinity College (3-1).

"Their goal is their biggest weakness," said head coach Jeff Gettler. "Neither of them have yet to be challenged. Their defense has kept most offenses at bay."

In goal, the Ephmen have been alternating between sophomore Charles Goldfarb and freshman Bill Hennig. Goldfarb has started four games and has won all four, two of those wins being shutouts. He currently holds a 88.9 save percentage. Hennig has had two shutout wins in three starts; his goals saved percent is 92.3.

"They have a strong midfield, especially with [junior Orjan] Hult in midfield," Gettler said. "Their sweeper [senior Dan Calichman], is a good man."

Junior Rob Lake is the current top scorer for the Ephman having seven goals and two assists for this season. Senior Doug Brooks is runner up with three goals and two assists. Senior Sam McIlvain leads the team in assists with three, having one goal for the season.

"Lake is a breakaway threat," said Gettler. "Brooks is a target player.

"I think they're the best Division III team in the country," Gettler said. "Their coach is a 1966 graduate of UMass. He was a soccer captain."

Minutewomen to hit the road against Fairfield

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts field hockey team will travel to Fairfield University this afternoon for a late afternoon (4 p.m.) contest.

The Minutewomen, 8-3-1, 3-1 in the Atlantic 10, and ranked No. 12 in the nation by the NCAA have won their last two games, a 9-0 win over Maine on Sunday and a 2-0 win over Atlantic 10 rival Temple University.

The Stags come into today's game with a 1-6 record, after having lost to the University of Lowell, 1-0 on Saturday. Fairfield has not exactly been a scoring machine.

In its seven games, the Stags have scored just two goals, one by Maureen Mooney and the other by Amy Dundero. Freshman Danielle Roux is Fairfield's goalie. She has recorded 83 saves in appearing in all of the Stags' games. Roux has given up 23 goals.

The Minutewomen had no problem at all putting the ball in the net on Sunday, though Maine was one of UMass' weaker opponents. But that was not the only reason for the outburst. Hixon made some positional changes.

"We've made our team stronger in the midfield and it seems to pay off," Hixon said.

The new midfield of Sherlan Cabralis at the left spot with junior Beth Thornton at the center and senior Kathy DeAngelis on the right side was a big factor in the Maine game.

DeAngelis scored two goals on Sunday and Thornton one to break the game wide open, 3-0, in the first half.

Tsongas blasts state Legislature

Fee increases, tuition hikes loom for next semester

From the Associated Press

BOSTON — Board of Regents Chairman Paul Tsongas accused the Massachusetts Legislature yesterday of sitting on the sidelines during the state's fiscal crisis and said lawmakers must decide if they want excellence or mediocrity in higher education.

Tsongas and Higher Education Chancellor Franklyn Jenifer also said students will face tuition or fee increases, or both, next semester.

"They are sitting back pretending nothing is happening," Tsongas said of the Legislature after a meeting with Gov. Dukakis.

"We pay these people to respond to crises. If they want to talk excellence and fund mediocrity, let them say it. At this point, they are having it both ways," he said.

"If they want a Mississippi system, fine, we can give it to you. If you want a California system, we can give that to you, too," Tsongas said.

Tsongas, Jenifer and other college and university officials met with Dukakis to plead with him to reduce the amount of money they must cut from their budgets.

Jenifer told reporters after the closed-door meeting that the $35 million in cuts ordered by Dukakis would dismantle the system and said they had argued for exemptions for items such as financial aid and tenured professors.

Asked about the likelihood of a tuition increase, Tsongas said, "On a scale of 1 to 10, a 12."

University of Massachusetts Chancellor Joseph Duffey said he would not support a tuition or fee increase unless there is a plan to support students who could not afford an increase.

"I am reluctant to raise fees," he said. "If that is done, there will have to be a plan to protect students for whom it [fee increase] is a major hardship."

Tsongas said Dukakis and the higher education officials were still disagreeing over the level of cuts.

But he said they agreed that the state's public higher education system needs a reliable long-term source of money and that individual college campuses should have maximum flexibility in deciding where budget cuts should be made.

Tsongas is pushing a statewide referendum question, that would appear on the November 1990 ballot, that would raise the state sales tax by a penny on the dollar to raise more money for higher education. He said he thought the state's voters might back the idea.

Committee to study research issues

By NATHAN KRYSTALL
Collegian Staff

As a result of last spring's demonstrations against Defense Department-funded research at the University of Massachusetts, the Faculty Senate formed an Ad Hoc Committee on Current Research Issues.

However, members — eight students and 12 faculty — differ over how the committee is proceeding.

"The committee work is proceeding well," said Chairperson Paul Shuldiner. "There is a willingness among the committee to get out and dig for information."

Shuldiner, a professor of civil engineering, said the committee is presently concentrating on educating themselves about the status of research issues at the University, including what research restrictions exist and public accessibility to research related documents.

But member Pratip Dastidar said the committee is lacking focus and a sense of urgency to tackle the research issue.

"It's an urgent situation," Dastidar said. "The committee will have to move extraordinarily fast to produce a response that will satisfy the entire campus community."

Dastidar, a graduate student in electrical engineering, said the committee has avoided one of the Faculty Senate's directives — to determine what constitutes socially-beneficial research, with the purpose of establishing guidelines on how such research can be promoted at the University.

Dastidar said members should discuss how they interpret socially-beneficial research simultaneously with their investigations of research issues. He added that the committee should primarily concern itself with DOD-financed research.

"The committee needs to ask itself: What is the policy that was challenged?" Dastidar asked rhetorically. "Namely DOD research policy," he answered.

Member Robert Ackermann, a professor of philosophy, said there has been no discussion on what constitutes

Former UM dean dies

From Collegian staff reports

Dr. Mario D. Fantini, former Dean of the School of Education at the University of Massachusetts, died Friday after a long illness.

At the time of his death, he was a resident of Woodland Hills, Calif.

Fantini served as dean of the University of Massachusetts School of Education from 1976 to September of 1987, when illness prompted his resignation.

Provost O'Brien lauded Fantini's contribution to the School of Education during his 10 years of service.

"Mario Fantini was a staunch advocate for the children in our nation's public schools and he worked tirelessly to bring the Univerity closer to the needs of our primary and secondary schools."

Dr. Fantini was born and educated in Philadelphia. He attended Temple University where he earned Bachelor of Science and Master of Arts degrees. He later earned a doctorate in education from Harvard University.

He began his career in education teaching underachieving pupils in a Philadelphia junior high school. This experience shaped his philosophy and was reflected throughout his career in his many publications and his advocacy for interventions to reduce the educational disadvantage of innercity youth, according to reports from the UMass School of Education.

From 1962 to 1964, he served as senior research associate at Syracuse University, Syracuse, NY, directing experimental programs in the city's public school system.

In 1965, he became the program officer for the Ford Foundation Fund for the Advancement of Education. During this period, he was named executive secretary of New York City Mayor Lindsey's panel on decentralization, which earned him recognition as the architect of school decentralization in that city.

Fantini rendered similar service to other communities, including Los Angeles and Washington. This work linked his name to the themes of community participation, alternative schools, and urban school reform. He was author or co-author of 15 books, contributed chapters to several other books, and published more than 100 articles.

KEEP ABORTION LEGAL

Abortion restrictions liberalized by House

From the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The House agreed yesterday to allow federally paid abortions for poor women who are victims of rape or incest, reversing nearly a decade of more restrictive votes and inviting a veto from President Bush.

By a 216-206 vote, the House rejected the language it has kept in the law since 1981 and instead endorsed a more liberal provision already passed by the Senate. An effort by conservatives to reverse the vote then failed, 212-207.

Federal aid for abortions, available under Medicaid, is now limited to poor women whose lives have been endangered by a pregnancy.

Yesterday's vote came three months after a Supreme Court ruling giving states greater powers to restrict abortions.

Lawmakers and activists who say women have a right to an abortion said the ruling spurred supporters of their position to make their views known to their legislators. Opponents agreed.

"The political momentum on this issue is so strong now that is President Bush vetoes this, he'd be making a big mistake," said Rep. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., who led the fight for the eased limitations.

Rep. Henry Hyde, R-Ill., who had led the anti-abortion fight in the House for years, said, "I couldn't characterize it any other way than as a defeat for the unborn. I was surprised, upset and disappointed."

House members without strong positions "felt they had the Supreme Court to protect them" until the July ruling, said Rep. Dale Kildes, D-Mich. and a supporter of tougher restrictions.

Now, however, "it's no longer a vote cast in a vacuum. It's a vote with real consequences," he said.

The provision agreed to by the House would allow Medicaid payments for abortions when the mother's life is in jeopardy or when the pregnancy resulted from a rape or incest that was "promptly"

SGA gives money to CASA, BMCP, for upcoming events

But senators debate as initial amounts reduced

By ROB SIMPSON
Collegian Staff

The Undergraduate Student Senate approved funds last night for speakers for a forum on American involvement in Nicaragua, and to send four members of Black Mass Communication Project to a communications conference at Howard University, Washington.

Sarah Becker, a member of the Central American Solidarity Association, asked that $1,500 from SGA Finance Reserve be used to bring Edgar Chamorro, former director of the Contras, David MacMichael, former CIA policy analyst, and a State Department representative. The Republican Club has been asked to choose the State Department representative.

The three speakers are scheduled to discuss Nicaragua next month, she said.

Senators Victoria Clement [Grayson] and Kevin Newnan [Johnson] successfully moved for an amendment to reduce the requested funds to $1206, subtracting $294 from advertising costs which they claimed weren't necessary.

CASA had wanted to place three advertisements in the Collegian and one in the Valley Advocate, but that amount was reduced to a single Collegian advertisement.

"[The reduction] wouldn't hurt the core of their program," Clement said.

Karen Talbot, chairperson of the Budgets Committee, argued against funding $920 for a trip by four BMCP members to Howard University, saying the funding was inconsistent with past allocation of funds to Registered Student Organizations.

"We need to be consistent as to what we spend out of [the Student Activities Trust Fund] and revenue," Talbot said.

She said RSOs should fund trips with their individual revenues.

SGA President Tracy Davis said the BMCP trip should be funded because it is an educational opportunity, and participants would bring back valuable information on communications that they could share with students in various programs.

The senate passed a Clement-sponsored motion to give the BMCP $760, instead of $920, saying that BMCP should pay for the conference's registration fee of $160.

"I wanted to be sure of a serious commitment on their part," she said.

Coming-Out Day called a success

By ROB SIMPSON
Collegian Staff

With the passing of National Coming-Out Day yesterday, the Lesbian, Bisexual and Gay Alliance hope an increased awareness of the gay community will reduce fear and hatred of that community, the co-president of the LBGA said yesterday.

"People shouldn't be ostracized for their differences, but appreciated," Max Mitchell said.

The LBGA had a table on the Campus Center concourse yesterday. Members of the alliance working the table donned pink and black articles of clothing, symbolizing the importance of gay awareness. They passed out flyers, discussed questions about gay issues, and gave out pink helium balloons to interested passers-by.

Mitchell said they weren't as organized as last year, the 1st year of National Coming-Out Day.

Mitchell said the day was successful.

"People have gotten involved. The table attracted a lot of attention," he said.

He said the main goal of the day was to let people know that lesbian, bisexual, and gay people exist, have a voice and have a say. Mitchell also said they are not only working to promote awareness, but also civility.

He said junior high school and high school students who are in the process of figuring out their sexual identity may be afraid to reveal to their peers a preference towards members of the same sex. People at that age tend to be cruel, using discriminatory words when referring to gay people, he said.

National Coming-Out Day gives members of the gay community an opportunity to express their sexual preference, he said, adding that its important for those people to come out so they can be recognized.

"Lesbians, bisexuals, and gays are everywhere. If those people don't come out, then people won't realize this," he said.

Mitchell said that one of every 10 people are gay, lesbian, or bisexual. He said that would mean 2,500 of the nearly 25,000 students at UMass are either gay, lesbian, or bisexual.

The LBGA also scheduled a 6:30 vigil to take place last night at the Fine Arts Center.

GSS wants graduate rep named to Board of Trustees

Grad students say they are not represented

By PAUL MORRIS
Collegian Staff

The Graduate Student Senate voted unanimously Tuesday to request that the University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees name a graduate student representative to the board.

Senate Vice President Pierre Laliberte said the Board of Trustees has the ultimate decision making power for the Boston, Worcester and Amherst campuses. Eric Nakajima, a UMass student trustee, but graduate students are not represented and have some different concerns, he said.

"A Graduate student on the board would make a difference," he said.

Graduate Council, Faculty Senate and the Board of Trustees must approve the request before a representative can join the board, according to Senate Executive Officer Bill Tull. If the motion is denied by any board, the GSS leaders will ask Rep. Stan Rosenberg, D-Amherst, to introduce an amendment to make graduate student representation on the board mandatory, he said.

In other business: Marc Kenen, a graduate student in education hired by the GSS to research the budget crisis, said for the first time the UMass operating budget consisted of more outside funds than state money during the 1988-89 school year.

He said while Massachusetts residents are now paying more taxes, the state is contributing less to UMass coffers.

"After cost of living adjustments, the state has cut over $17 million from the UMass budget in the last three years."

He said by accepting outside funds, the administration loses control over how the resources are allocated. Businesses, citizens and government all have specific reasons for giving money to UMass, he said.

DOD-financed research has increased from four percent in 1981 to 21 percent during the 1988-89 school year, according to documents from the UMass Office of Grants and Contracts.

Kenen said that on Nov. 8, all teachers will be asked to devote their class time for a discussion of budget cuts.

Noho folk festival to share cultures

By BRIAN PURCELL
Collegian Staff

African drumming, Swedish fiddling, and Old English dancing will all be featured in a week-long folk festival in Northampton, scheduled to begin Sunday.

The Pioneer Valley Folklore Society's Family Folk Week gives people an opportunity to participate in multicultural events that cover a wide range of traditional and modern aspects of folk art, said Davis Bates, managing director of PVFS.

"One of the things that we've discovered is that folk art is really a community thing. It was meant for all generations," he said. "We're trying to get all generations to participate together."

Bates said many of the events recreate a time when families would get together and share their culture through singing, dancing, and storytelling. This practice has largely died out, especially in societies where radio and television have become a substitute for interaction, Bates said.

The folk week will let audience members experience this sense of community, he said.

The festivities will include a performance Thursday, Oct. 19, by The Kaynors, a local family of musicians. The Folk Traditions Community House will hold a party featuring Old English, African, and Carribean dancing on Friday, Oct. 20.

Other events include a family workshop and concert on African drumming on Sunday, Oct. 22. This will provide an opportunity for the audience to learn basic drum rhythms and hear the talents of the musicians.

Bates said the week's activities will not only emphasize community, but also the diversity of all cultures.

"We really are trying to use it as a bridge between culture," he said. "Every [culture's] folk art has a message to share with each other's."

For more information on the upcoming events, call Davis Bates at 586-5285.

Stolen cow found in dorm lobby

Police were called to the lobby of John Adams Residence Hall yesterday morning to assist a cow that lost its footing and fell in its own diarrhea, police said.

The 2-year-old heifer was stolen from Youngstock Barn and led to Southwest, police said. The barn is located next to the playing fields on Massachusetts Drive. Police do not know who took the cow from the barn.

After police helped the cow to its feet, the Assistant Farm Manager of the barn, Richard Barnicle, and his son transported the cow back its home, police said.

Robert Barnicle, the assistant manager's son, said he believes someone used a garden hose as a halter to lead the cow to the dorm.

This is not the first time a bovine has made an appearance in a Residence Hall, the younger Barnicle said.

"This is nothing new," he said. "We removed a cow from the 22nd floor of a tower a few years ago."

Communist East German leadership willing to discuss possible reforms

BERLIN (AP) — The Communist East German leadership yesterday strongly reaffirmed the nation's commitment to socialism but expressed willingness to discuss possible reforms.

A lengthy statement from the ruling Politburo capped a day of conflicting signals as to whether the country would maintain the course of hard-line leader Erich Honecker or undertake the type of reform now sweeping much of Eastern Europe.

"All expressions of opinion and suggestions for attractive socialism in the GDR (East Germany) are important," the Politburo said. "We are open to discussions."

The statement, distributed by the official news agency ADN, also addressed the issue of the exodus of tens of thousands of East Germans.

"We aren't indifferent when people who worked and lived here renounce our German Democratic Republic," the statement said. "The reasons for the step could be varied. We must and will seek out them (the reasons) among ourselves, each in his place, all of us together."

The statement made no express mention of the country's growing opposition movement, but it called on East Germans to refrain from the kinds of street demonstrations that swept through the country last week and on Monday night.

Earlier, party sources said high-ranking Communist officials had warned of possible labor unrest and demanded a report on the nation's "critical situation" from Honecker.

Also yesterday, East Germany's chief ideologist Kurt Hager reversed himself and called for reform to curb growing unrest.

The demand for a report, made by party members at a meeting Tuesday of the Politburo, suggests Honecker may face an internal challenge to his 18-year leadership. The sources disclosed it soon after the radio broadcast Hager's remarks.

Party sources, speaking on condition of anonymity, said some members of the 163-seat Central Committee were invited to the meeting of the Politburo, which has 21 members. The sources said the meeting continued late yesterday.

They quoted the complaining officials as telling Honecker "there are increasing signs of coming strikes in the factories" and "there is no time to waste."

Strike talks break down

BOSTON (AP) — Discussions between NYNEX Corp. and union officials representing 60,000 striking telephone workers broke off yesterday after company officials said their latest contract offer was final, a union official said.

"Negotiating is sitting down and talking," said Adele Stacy, a spokeswoman for the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. "I think the company needs to learn how to negotiate. There are no meetings scheduled."

But Peter Cronin, a spokesman for New England Telephone Co., blamed the union for the breakdown. He said an afternoon meeting had been scheduled Tuesday after the company made a new contract offer, but the union failed to show up.

"The union leadership has demonstrated that it is unresponsive to the needs of its striking members and the needs of the public by failing to bring this 10-week old strike to a prompt end."

Stacy told a different version of the day's events, however. She said union representatives spent the morning preparing a counter offer but were rebuffed by the telephone company.

She said when the union called New England Telephone to schedule a meeting, company officials said, "we made our final offer yesterday and if you're not willing to accept that offer, we'll send you a letter when we're willing to meet again."

Workers walked off the job Aug. 6 after contract discussions broke down over salary and health care issues.

Duke unveils budget-balancing plan

BOSTON (AP) — The Dukakis administration yesterday unveiled its long-awaited budget-balancing plan that would cut red ink by $347 million, much of it through administrative actions the governor has already ordered.

Lawmakers were asked to act on only $134 million, including a plan to make bottlers turn over to the state $46 million in unclaimed beer and soda pop bottle and can deposits, including money from last year.

The Legislature also was asked to approve a $40 million plan to require that trust funds that pay for some employees at public colleges and universities also pickup the tab for the workers' fringe benefits.

The proposal, released at a news conference by Administration and Finance Secretary L. Edward Lashman, also endorses a state lottery-run football betting game and the establishment of off-track betting in Chicopee. But those proposals, which would raise an estimated $56 million, won't take effect until the state bookkeeping year that begins July 1, 1990.

The remainder of Gov. Dukakis' plan includes the $153 million in administrative spending cuts already ordered by Lashman and $60 million in additional revenue that can be collected without legislative approval.

Lashman said that counting the $491 million trimmed by Dukakis from the budget in July, spending cuts now total more than $640 million from the budget the governor received from the Legislature.

Lashman also warned, "There may well be further revenue shortfalls. By no means are we out of the woods."

The Revenue Advisory board, an independent panel that advises the state on tax collections, warned last week the deficit could be as high as $500 million.

House Speaker George Keverian, D-Everett, said he expected the House to act quickly on the plan and Lashman said, "We would hope to see floor action beginning next week."

Keverian said the fact that Lashman had worked with House leaders and rank-and-file members in preparing the plan "should expedite the process in dealing with the administration's recommendations."

The plan, along with a competing proposal introduced yesterday by three Democrats legislators, will first be reviewed by the budget-writing House Ways and Means Committee before going to the House floor.

The three legislators, who received an outline of the Dukakis plan on Tuesday at a closed-door House Democrat caucus, aid it was too early to be talking about additional revenue, as the governor did.

"This is not the time to be discussing revenue increases," said Rep. Robert Havern, D-Arlington.

Havern said the plan, if approved quickly, could save about $300 million this state bookkeeping year and $391 million in the fiscal year that will begin July 1.

Politburo member Egon Krenz was responsible for the restraint shown by security forces to show restraint during Monday's pro-democracy demonstrations in Leipzig, East Berlin, and Dresden, the sources said. Krenz often is mentioned as a successor to Honecker.

Late yesterday, the official news agency ADN said Honecker had postponed a visit to Denmark scheduled for Oct. 25-26. No reason was given.

Hager, one of the hierarchy's most influential figures, recommended a greater role for the people in solving national problems, a more open society, and reform of the state-controlled news media. He did not suggest specific actions.

Hager, also 77, made the recommendations in an interview Saturday with the Soviet weekly newspaper Moscow News while street protests were under way and Soviet President Mikhail S. Gorbachev was visiting East Germany.

Flesh For Lulu sings only for fun

By AL KAUFMAN
Collegian Staff

"We never think, let's make an album that's going to be commercial, or not be commercial. We just go in and make the album we want to make. It's an honest approach, and I hope it will get us what we want to achieve ... which is total world domination."

Those are the words of Nick Marsh, lead vocalist and guitarist of the English band Flesh For Lulu. And although the line was said in jest, Marsh may not be too far from the truth. Currently on tour with PIL, (they play UMass tomorrow) and with a brilliant new album, Plastic Fantastic, just hitting the shelves, the Flesh may just turn out to be the next big thing.

Flesh For Lulu was born in 1983, when Marsh teamed up with drummer James Mitchell. They took their name from Marsh's girlfriend at the time, and were quickly signed by Polydor. Guitarist Rocco Barker and bassist Kevin Mills joined and they released their self-titled debut album.

Bet the sports system way

"Who's going to win the World Series?"

"Awww, come on, Oakland all the way."

"Get out of town. With Will the Thrill and all those other guys, San Fran's got it made."

"Betcha 20 bucks Oakland wins it."

"You're on."

Jim Clark

The hands shake, sealing the bargain. These kind of transactions go on all the time, in barrooms and factories, dormitories and newsrooms. And maybe, someday, in supermarkets, pharmacies and convenience stores.

Well, maybe not verbal betting between two parties. But we, the people of the Commonwealth, seem to be on a collision course with some kind of legalized sports betting system, which will help to ease the fiscal crunch that has crashed down upon us.

There are many arguments that support and denounce such an action. Whereas sports are a vital part of society, worshipped by millions of people, it would be a natural source of supplemental revenue. Folks who shell out a buck twice a week to bet on a jackpot with astronomical odds of winning would surely stand to gain on a sports betting system that has much greater return.

Plus, betting on sports tends to bring new excitement to what may otherwise be a dud of an event. Those who couldn't care less about whether Calgary or Montreal wins the Stanley Cup will suddenly see their interest jolted when some of their hard-earned dough is plunked down on one side of the battle.

Now the negative. With the tremors of the Pete Rose affair still shaking the baseball world, it appears that legalized betting could do only harm to sports. Look at the past history.

There's Joe Jackson (my favorite, both the ballplayer and the musician, by the way) and the rest of the Chicago Black Sox, brought to recent light by such movies as Field of Dreams and Eight Men Out.

Members of the 1919 White Sox team allegedly went into the tank on purpose to get even with owner Charlie Comiskey, who refused to compensate them fairly for their performances. Although acquitted in court, they were subsequently banned from baseball forever by Judge Kenesaw Mountain Landis, the first commissioner.

In later years, players such as Rick Kuhn, a former Boston College basketball player, have been accused of "point-shaving," or taking payoffs from bookmakers and purposely "throwing" games to assure that the bettors will win.

These are legitimate arguments, and it's hard to predict whether legalized betting will only bring more black marks like the Rose affair into the athletic spectrum.

But why not give it a shot? After all, sports such as horse racing, dog racing and jai alai have been allowed in most every state for years. And despite the possibility of tampering (i.e. payoffs to trainers of horses and dogs), betting has thrived in these particular cases.

With State Treasurer Robert Q. Crane recently announcing that he will not seek re-election, it may be time to seriously push this thing through Beacon Hill. Whoever the new treasurer is will be faced with the big challenge of cleaning up the mess that Gov. Eyebrows and his staff have created.

As far as flooding the market, that doesn't seem like a problem. The lottery commission keeps churning out instant games, scratch tickets and other drawings, all of which produce a wad of cash for the state. Megabucks would have been sufficient, but then along came Mass Millions, and the people are eating that up. A sports betting system would merely supplement that, as well as add a little variety to the dull and methodical picking of numbers.

Maybe it won't work. Maybe scandal will still run rampant. But in the grand scheme of things, given the current problems we face — short-changed education, lack of police and fire protection, etc. — scandal in sports really isn't that big of a deal.

Let's give it a try.

Josh Galitsky

I hate my stepmother. I mean I really hate my stepmother. The mere mention of her name makes me break out in an indistinguishable rash. When I think about living in the same house as her, the images that come to mind are like scenes from The Exorcist. I see her as "evil personified."

I'll never forget when my dad first met the "evil one." We were bachelors living in an apartment together and I had been keeping a little black book of names, figuring he needed a little help in the swingin' singles department. She was the first and only name in the book. No stars, no nothin'. As I recall, she got a negative rating and then he went on to marry the (censored).

The first time I met her, I laughed and cried at the same time. She was an extremely dumpy-looking woman who resembled a large piece of broccoli. She seemed lazy and almost had to be surgically removed from the couch when she got up to greet me. Then I cried when I came to the horrible realization that my dad was dating her.

In the early days, she really suckered my dad in. She would cook huge shrimp dinners for him and his entire side of the family. After he agreed to marry her, it became turkey dinners with only the immediate family. After the wedding, it was TV dinners with the cat. The only shrimp we ever saw again was in the Boston Aquarium.

We eventually all moved into a house. My stepmonster's wicked and warped ways swelled. She was cold and she had that hideous laugh of two seals during mating season. We spent the first two years without acknowledging each other's existence. She finally broke our code of silence with a mumble and a cough complaining that "somebody had put too much milk in his cereal."

The woman had no logic. She went out and bought us separate towels, separate cups, separate dishes, and get this . . . separate fruit racks. And then, she would tell us we should be more "together" as a family. When she went shopping, she would buy stuff that we didn't like so it would "stay in the refrigerator longer."

Once she began to speak to me in her grunts and groans, I realized just how much of a nag she really was. She would annoy us with snide comments and redundant advice until we would walk out of the room convinced she was still talking to herself. She is an electrologist, and Lord knows she had plenty of verbal practice over the years before torturing people professionally.

I lived with the spawn of Satan for over four years, and two things amaze me: 1) I am amazed that I made it through that time alive, and 2) I'm even more amazed that I didn't kill her. There were countless times when I used to plot and plan how I was going to do it. "The waterbed — no, no, the chandelier." I once thought the only reason I didn't kill her was because I loved my dad. Now I look back and see that it was only because I was afraid of getting caught.

I am not the type of person that goes around hating others. In fact, I can't think of anyone I truly hate except her. I have matured since I lived at home and now I have realized a better way than murder to get my revenge. I'm going to write a best-selling book about her that exposes her as the weenie she really is. This is chapter one.

Notes from the Campus Center Basement

If you are looking to cheer yourself up I have the answer: rent Bill and Ted's Excellent Adventure. This silly, inane comedy is guaranteed to cheer anyone up. It has absolutely no point, and is intended so, an inane plot, and is intended to be so, and a cast of silly characters, and they could be no other way, and stars two unknowns, and George Carlin. I think it was Clarence Clemens who made a cameo appearance as the future leader of the world which has elevated Bill and Ted to divine status — oops don't want to give the whole thing away . . .

A couple of weeks ago, I was able to attend a briefing on toxic waste sites for the MassPIRGers who are organizing citizen groups in the area. What is going on with our environment is horrible.

Toxic waste sites take two years to be identified, two more years for plans to drawn up for disposal, and then even more time for the actual act of cleaning it up. Actually, this is if things run absolutely perfectly, which they don't.

It was explained to me that a site has existed for over twelve years in the Lexington area, and residents are still trying to get it cleaned up. Kinda scary.

Now for the serious immediate future, which is really is scary and will affect every person on this campus.

Next Wednesday's rally, protest, march — whatever is going to be held at the state house against the budget cuts to higher education. This is something that everyone can agree on, it is wrong.

Peter Leon

It is a point where all of us can come together. Whether you are a PSRUer trying to prevent DOD research on campus, or a right-to-lifer trying to save the unborn children on campus, or someone working to combat racism on campus, or a person trying to make sure the commies don't take over the campus, we all have to come together or soon there may be no campus at all, and then all the things you are working for/against are just moot.

The prospects for this university are already dim. Enrollment is being slashed, departments disbanded, and financial aid is fizzling up.

Education is the cornerstone of any civilization. It is how tradition and knowledge are handed down. Our society has no chance for a continuous existence if its members can't read the directions to make pancakes on a Bisquick box, or can't write out an order form for more cassettes or CD's.

These may seem like trivial points but all other things follow the simple tasks of life, like being able to read a job application or fill out an order form for more text books.

This week's quote: " 'Tis virtue and not birth that make us noble: Great actions speak great minds and they should govern."

A great action next Wednesday would be for thousands of students to show up at the state house. We would then be great minds and thus remind our elected representatives that we do indeed govern.

Thus, 'til next Thursday, or even better, Wednesday, when I hope to see all of you bright-eyed and bushy-tailed and face in Boston, it is time to act!

Collegian's cultural history manifests itself

I like to maintain a strict policy of never writing about what goes on within the walls of the Collegian. It has, however, been tough to restrain myself these past couple of weeks in light of the concern certain members of the University community have expressed regarding the structure of the Collegian, and its sensitivity (or lack thereof) to minority students.

At this point in time, as managing editor, I feel it is not only appropriate, but necessary for me to address the issues that have arisen, and the solutions that have been arrived at by the Collegian staff, concerned students and faculty.

This paper has quite a history. Unfortunately, not all of it we can be proud of.

The institution of the Black Affairs section in 1973 was a response to racist material that consistently and repeatedly appeared on the pages of the Collegian. I was six years old in 1973, but thanks to certain members of the administration, some fellow journalists and a few students, I've learned my history.

The fall 1986 Halloween parody issue tastlessly made jokes in reference to the 1986 Southwest riot. I was a correspondent then; I've learned my history.

Last semester, the April Fools' parody issue contained a story about Muslim terrorists kidnaping and murdering the Collegian's editor-in-chief. This too was insensitive. I've learned my history.

Cosmo Macero Jr.

Sprinkled between these outstanding examples, have been cases of poor editing, poor word selection and improper usage. Mistakes? Yes. A conscious effort to be oppressive? No. Uninformed writers make mistakes. In these cases, those mistakes led to impressions of racial insensitivity. But, to paraphrase one student with whom I have become quite familiar lately — when it comes to racial sensitivity, ignorance is no excuse.

The Board of Editors' decision in September to develop a Multicultural Affairs section was based on a genuine need for staff members, as well as the concerns expressed by members of other minority communities other than the Black community.

We genuinely felt that by creating this section, we could broaden the struggling Black Affairs section to include the other communities, hopefully attract new staff, and become more responsible to more students.

Looks good on paper. It still does. And I honestly think it was a decision made for the better. However, history surfaced, and the 16 years behind the Black Affairs section had a strong voice. In addition, members of the Third World community expressed an equal voice, and gave quite a history lesson of their own about insensitivity toward their concerns in past Collegian pages. Things got ugly at times, and strong words were used. But compromises were made. This is what we have :

1. The current Multicultural Affairs desk. 2. A bi-weekly Multicultural Affairs page. 3. A bi-weekly Third World Affairs page. 4. A bi-weekly Black Affairs page. I think it's time we made some good history. Agree?

Democracy is in trouble

One of the generally unquestioned beliefs of modern history is that fascism was destroyed forever with the victory of the Allied and Soviet forces at the close of World War II. Many felt that with Hitler and the Third Reich decimated, civilization had exorcised fascism. But is fascism dead?

Jay Allain

Fascism itself is defined as "a political philosophy or movement which exalts the nation and race and stands for a centralized autocratic government headed by a dictatorial leader, severe economic and social regimentation, and forcible suppression of opposition." I would argue that there had been a fascist drift in the U.S. body politic in the past decade and Ollie North and the Iran-Contra scandal only hinted at the depth of this encroachment. Before solutions can be forged, we must first confront the symptoms of this disorder.

First, we must not equate the new fascism with the flamboyance and total mobilization of the Third Reich; indeed, much of fascism's power today is its secretiveness. As in Orwell's "Nineteen Eighty-four," we face an adversary which is everywhere and nowhere. Consider economics.

In the past decade, we have witnessed a steady polarization of the economy into "Haves" and "Have Nots." The rising cost of living, skirted by official statistics, has placed a new albatross on the people: Either become ensnared in poverty or join the yuppified legions. Who can revel such a debased criteria for assessing one's fellow human beings as the one based on class today? We appear as a nation lost, clinging to the idol, money, for our bearings. Every billboard, piece of clothing, or stranger's look suggests that you are either one of Us, the right-thinking sort, or one of Them, the poor and stigmatized.

Too, as with traditional forms of fascism, active persecution of certain groups is imperative. When, for example, has one heard genuine pleas for the plight of the homeless, AIDS sufferers or drug users? In today's brave new consciousness, we readily dehumanize these sub-groups. It is as if hardness of the heart has become a new national virtue. And yet even for reasons of self-interest, we should insist that the homeless become a higher national priority as projections estimate that 15 million more of us will join their ranks by the year 2004. Solutions flow from the power of perceptions and the subsequent willingness to act. And we need dramatic changes in the way we perceive "the Other" — one whose class or race or gender may be different.

What role does the U.S. government have in today's silent holocaust? Our foreign and domestic policy, with its purported goal of stopping international communism and making the nation secure within, contributes to our plight. Cold War expenditures in the U.S. have cost us the same sum that everything in this country, except the land, costs. A full 52 cents from every tax dollar funds the Pentagon while a mere 10 cents remains for essentials: education, transportation, the environment, justice, government, employment, commerce and national resources. The elites' fear of change in the international scene continues to see us fund an unpopular and murderous regime in El Salvador (ARENA) while domestic critics of that policy have been trailed by the FBI. Smell the coffee: democracy is in trouble.

There's always the movies

You are completely stressed about your classes and major. You have no clue what you want to do with your life. You need direction and inspiration. So what should you do?

Go to the movies!

Minu Sebastian

I know what you're thinking. How can a movie give a person ideas about careers and the future? Most movies do not have messages of advice. Most movies do not move people to think about themselves or their life. Most movies are completely irrelevant to a stressed out college student.

Except for one. Dead Poet's Society. This movie was released this summer, but for the last two weeks has been playing at the Amherst Cinema.

When I walked into the theater the first time, I saw this movie, I did not know what to expect. I knew Robin Williams was one of the main characters in the film, so I expected to have a few laughs and then go home.

Although I did laugh a lot during the film, I felt it had more depth and insight than most films. I left the theater feeling inspired, energetic and relieved, feelings which are usually suppressed in day to day college living.

The movie takes place in an all boys' private school in Vermont. The year is 1959 and Robin Williams plays the part of a "radical" English school teacher. The school is very strict and constraining. The students are taught to live by an honor code and are often asked to recite the main theme of the school: "Tradition, Honor, Discipline and Excellence."

The best parts of the film were the scenes from Robin Williams' classroom. He taught his students to think for themselves, appreciate art and live life to the fullest. He quoted great poets such as Robert Frost, Walt Whitman and Henry David Thoreau.

It's so easy to just read our texts and regurgitate what our professors want to hear. We should learn to think for ourselves. Unless we formulate our own ideas or opinions, we are not really living.

We should realize that life is more than careers, money and "success." To quote Robin Williams: "Engineering, business and law are all noble pursuits and are needed to sustain life, but poetry, love and beauty . . . these are the things we stay alive for."

We should realize that every day is precious and that we have the power to make a difference. "The powerful play goes on . . . what will your verse be?"

We should follow our hearts and dreams. Do everything you want to do. "Carpe diem!"

If you are looking for some direction or purpose in life, you should not have to go very far, just look inside yourself.

And if that doesn't work, don't be discouraged — you could always go the movies.

Watch your sexist language

I was delighted to see the issue of gender-neutral language brought up by Danny Cohen in The Collegian last week (Sept. 28, "Standing up for others is not a crime"), and shocked at the denigrating response he received from at least one classmate for asking the professor to use the gender-neutral term "Congressperson" rather than "Congressman." If the article had focused on the issue of gender-neutral language per se rather than the irate classmate, I would have posted it in my department office (COINS), as gender-neutral language is far from common here.

Last year, some other graduate students and I brought the issue up in some of our classes, with reasonable success. However, this year, as I started attending classes and seminars offered by other faculty (not just in my own department), I felt like we were beginning all over from scratch, as system designers and users, doctors, and researchers were all "he" and "those guys" once again.

Sexist language (such as using "he" as a generic third person pronoun) is exclusionary. When someone speaks of "the scientist" or "the researcher," I can easily envision myself or one of my female colleagues in that role, until the speaker (male or female) follows up with "he." I have to say that I am beginning to find it very tiresome, and yearn for a group that has moved beyond this point.

Sexist language also implies that male is the norm. With the use of "he" for a processor, algorithm, or matrix, the inanimate object is personified — as a male. What about the use of "it " for such inanimate objects? We can animate them by saying "it wants to . . . " "it sends a message to . . ." and so on, if we like — without assigning a particular gender.

Issuing a disclaimer of any ill-intent, as well-intentioned as it is, does not really help.

The use of "he" for everything still has its impact, just as would the use of racist language even if one claimed in advance that no harm was meant.

My personal preference is "he or she" for people, "it" for non-humans, and the use of gender-neutral terms such as "mail carrier" and "salesperson."

It can only help to remind both women and men that individuals of both genders are active and appropriate participants of fields historically dominated by one or the other gender, and neither is more "the norm" than the other.

Time to stop the Domino effect

Domino's Pizza has a history of anti-women and anti-labor activities, and every time you buy a pizza you support this.

If you are at all concerned with protecting women's reproductive rights, do not buy Domino's pizza. Contrary to Domino's claims in its advertisement (Wed., Sept. 27, Collegian), not only did Tom Monaghan give $50,000 of his "personal" money to a Michigan anti-choice group (Where did this money come from, Tom? Perhaps, Domino's profits?), but the record also states that a $10,000 gift was given to the same anti-choice group in the name of the Domino's Farms Corporation. Also, an Ann Arbor National Organization For Women event was canceled by Domino's Farms upon hearing that the money raised would be used for the pro-choice agenda. Prior to the canceled NOW event, the same facility was used for an anti-choice fund-raiser.

As well as being anti-women, Domino's has a reputation for anti-labor practices. There is currently a boycott on Domino's by the National Safe Workplace Institute, a group that monitors job hazards. According to Joseph Kinney of the National Safe Workplace Institute, "Domino's driver death rate is inexcusably high: as high as the rate for job-related deaths in the mining industry," (Sept. 25, 1989, People). There have been at least twenty fatal accidents due to Domino's 30-minute delivery policy in 1988 alone. These are only the deaths "officially acknowledged" by Domino's, so the numbers may be higher.

Tom Monaghan has refused to try to stop these senseless deaths by maintaining his obviously dangerous 30-minute delivery policy for his own profits. Seventeen-year-old Jesse Colson was one of those killed making a "speedy" delivery. His mother, Suzanne Boutros, says, "He was determined to be the best, and not have any "lates," (Sept. 25, 1989, People).

Why must women and drivers die for Domino's profits?

Keep up the boycott!!

UMass borrowers are responsible

As most college students struggling to pay for their education know, the nation's financial aid resources are dwindling rapidly.

This causes many citizens and congresspeople to claim that the "undeserving" recipients did not work for the money in the first place. In reality, over 70 percent of all federal and state aid comes in the form of student loans. This is clearly not a hand-out if one considers UMass' low default rate of 4.2 percent.

To put our achievement into perspective, the federal government begins to sanction schools with a 7.2 percent default rate and withdraws all assistance after 20 percent. Obviously, the UMass student of past and present is aware that defaulting on a loan damages one's credit rating.

UMass students help disprove the negative stereotype of the irresponsible young adult. Armed with our reputation, we are able to demand an increase of student loans, which are anything but a "free lunch."

Senator Paul Simon took this idea one step further in proposing a program of voluntary national service in exchange for forgiveness on educational loans.

abortion vote

reported to authorities. Since 1981 — and as recently as Aug. 2 — the House had voted for language limiting federal aid to abortions only in cases in which the woman's life was in danger.

Just a year ago, the Senate caved to the restrictive House position on Medicaid abortion financing by a vote of 47-43.

The abortion provision is part of a $156.7 billion measure to finance labor, health and education programs for fiscal 1990, which began Oct. 1. The spending bill, which was approves 364-56, now moves to the Senate.

Bush threatened in August to veto the bill if it contains the more liberal abortion language. Administration officials reiterated that threat yesterday.

The president's senior advisers would recommend a veto if Congress sent him a bill that would pay "for abortions in cases beyond when the life of the mother is endangered," said Alixe Glen, a White House spokeswoman.

ARTS & LIVING

Max Roach produces string quartet's album

By BILL ROSENBLATT
Collegian Staff

One of the important trends in the penumbra of jazz is the proliferation of groups made up of one type of instrument only, sometimes augmented by a rhythm section. In recent years, there have been all-brass groups (Lester Bowie's Brass Fantasy, the Herb Robertson Brass Ensemble and the Dirty Dozen Brass Band), all-sax quartets (the World, Rova and 29th Street Saxophone Quartets), and string quartets (the Turtle Island, Black Swan and Uptown String Quartets). The last-named of these has ties to UMass and has just put out its debut album, Max Roach Presents the Uptown String Quartet.

Roach, who produced the album, is the living legend of jazz who helped start UMass' jazz program. He currently serves as a part-time faculty member — between his myriad world-wide playing and composing gigs — and as host of the Jazz All-Stars concert held every December at the Fine Arts Center. The Uptown String Quartet performed with Roach at the FAC a couple of years ago as half of his Double Quartet, in what was one of the year's musical highlights. Eileen Folson, the group's current cellist, appeared at Bowker Auditorium last year with the Black Swan Quartet.

Valley Jazz

Another connection to UMass is that one of the tunes on the album was arranged by Dr. Fred Tillis, the UMass music professor and Fine Arts Center director.

Of all the instrumental lineups mentioned above, the string quartet seems the most out of place with respect to the Black music tradition; such a lineup is normally associated with European classical music. In producing the Uptown String Quartet's album, Roach is trying to establish a permanent repertoire for pieces in this instrumental format that merge elements of African-American music with those of European music.

The notion of a string quartet playing jazz or other Black musics is no longer a novelty. Yet this instrumentation still poses a danger of losing the essential qualities of Black music (improvisation, swing, ambiguity of pitch, etc.), leaving a hollow musical shell. Consider the Vienna Boys Choir singing Negro spirituals, a symphony orchestra playing Duke Ellington "straight," or an American trying to speak French without the proper accent. Or more relevantly, the Kronos Quartet trying to play Thelonious Monk.

The members of the Uptown Quartet have the credentials to avoid this pitfall. They were all classically trained but also have roots in jazz (two of them literally so: violist Maxine Roach is — you guessed it — Max's daughter, and violinist Lesa Terry is the niece of veteran jazz trumpeter Clark Terry). They amply demonstrated that they can swing, play the blues and improvise at the aforementioned concerts.

Unfortunately, the album comes off sounding more like classical chamber music than jazz, mainly because there is more emphasis on arrangements than on improvisation. The tunes represent various elements of the Black music tradition, including spirituals, blues, ragtime and jazz. The arrangements were done by TIllis, members of Roach's working group, and bassist/composer Bill Lee (father of film director Spike). They are very inventive, spanning a wide range of colors and moods, but only a few of them allow room for stretching out.

That aside, the album can be appreciated as very good chamber music. I prefer hearing this group when they play with a rhythm section, as they did at the FAC and on the two Max Roach Double Quartet albums Bright Moments and Easy Winners (both on Soul Note). Still, Max Roach Presents the Uptown String Quartet is worthwhile for anyone interested in exploring the boundaries between two major musical traditions.

Dylan returns musically, but not lyrically

By JAMES MALOY

Oh Mercy
Bob Dylan
Columbia Records

RECORD REVIEW

Bob Dylan has spent the better part of the past ten years receiving the short end of the stick from critics and listeners. Longtime fans moan over the fact that Dylan is no longer trying to tackle the world in the course of a single song like he did in the mid-sixties; critics have had a field day maligning his conversion to Christianity and savaging his post-conversion vinyl output. Perhaps as a result, his albums over the past 10 years have been wildly inconsistent, varying from the awful (Knocked-Out Loaded) to the mediocre (Dylan and the Dead) to the pretty damn spiffy (Infidels). Much of this inconsistency stems from his use of disparate sets of musicians on each album; everyone from Dave Stewart to Sly and Robbie have appeared with him in the past six years. However, the general consensus seems to be that he will never make another album to rival the best of his mid-1960s or 1970s work.

Well, folks, Maybe it's time to stop comparing his new stuff to Blonde on Blonde. It's not only blatantly unfair to Dylan, but it's stupid as well. Only a chowderhead would expect someone in his late 40s to be able to rival, let alone reproduce, the hurricane of verbal brilliance and sonic fury that his best music of the sixties unleashes. Expectations that high, not only doom anyone's album to failure, but prevent appreciation of whatever values may be inherent in that album.

And Dylan's new album Oh Mercy, has an embarrassment of musical riches to bestow upon anyone willing to give it half a chance.

Oh Mercy is a stately, haunting and ultimately fulfilling album that creates a compelling musical atmosphere behind Dylan's lyrics. In fact, it is something of a rarity in the Dylan catalogue, in that the album would stand on its own even without Dylan's lyrics, which are unexceptional.

"Political World" and "Everything Is Broken," the album's "hardest-rocking" songs, are vague in their politics and don't say much of anything; "Disease of Conceit" is the lyrical low point. "Ring Them Bells" and "Man in the Long Black Coat" are cryptic, but somewhat evocative. The ballads on side two, addressed to an unknown woman, fare better. "Most of the Time" is an "I-can-survive-without-her" tract which ultimately reveals how strongly the singer is still hooked. And "What Good Am I" is legitimately great, a simple but forceful exploration of conscience and responsibility.

However, the album's greatest asset is the beautiful world of sound created by Dylan and his backing group of New Orleans' finest musicians. Cyril Neville, Rockin' Dopsie, Willie Green and particularly Mason Ruffner all contribute to the moody backdrop which reminds one of nothing so much as cross between Creedence's mellower material and Brian Eno's Apollo, if that makes any sense. Give Daniel Lanois credit for yet another stellar production.

And give Bob Dylan credit for not following in the footsteps of the other Wilburys and having Jeff Lynne turn his album into a faceless mass of bright guitars and production tricks like Tom Petty, George Harrison and even Roy Orbison did. Oh Mercy has absolutely no potential as a hit-making monster, which is all the more reason to go out and buy it — it doesn't sound like it was made by machines. It has human fingerprints all over it. It doesn't assault you or even explicitly demand your attention. The care that went into it's creation is evident. And it sounds best at sunset.

Chapman at Crossroads, Schloff takes off

By AL KAUFMAN
Collegian Staff

Crossroads
Tracy Chapman
Electra

Live at the Undergound
Barb Schloff

I've been feeling sorry for Tracy Chapman ever since she was nominated for all those Grammy awards for her first album, for no matter how great her follow-up album was going to be, it would be unfairly judged against her brilliant debut. It's tough to improve on perfection, and even Tracy Chapman can't do it. Her new album, Crossroads, isn't as good as Tracy Chapman, but it is hardly a bad album. It's just different.

She is as tough as ever. On "Born To Fight," she sings of record companies and critics who insist on calling her the "voice of the new generation." She sings, "They're trying to hurt me inside/And make me into a white man's drone." But she lets the world know, "There ain't no man or woman/No beast alive that can beat me/'Cause I'm born to fight."

The politics are still there. Although the songs are more preachy than personal, the fire that sparks her anger is notably present. On "Subcity," about the forgotten working class, she sings, "I'd like to give Mr. President my honest regards/For disregarding me."

She even chastises the sympathetic yuppies who make up the bulk of her fans in "Material World." She scolds, "You in your fancy/Material world/Don't see the links of chain/Binding blood."

"Freedom Now," a song dedicated to Nelson Mandela that she performed on the Human Rights Tour, is the obvious single on the album.

The personal love songs are there too. "Be careful of My Heart" and "A Hundred Years" show her fragile, insecure side. Although neither is as beautiful as "Baby Can I Hold You" from the first album.

RECORD REVIEW

The problem with this album is, with the exception of "All That You Have Is Your Soul," in which Neil Young plays a gentle guitar and piano, the album is grossly overproduced and full sounding. The stark sound that fueled the debut is conspicuously absent. It is replaced by rich instrumentation that makes songs like "A Hundred Years" sound like future adult contemporary hits.

Chapman seems to be catering to the people she loathes, namely the middle-class who like to relieve their guilt by listening to people like Tracy Chapman, and pretending they understand.

But Chapman has led the way for more people to sing of the struggles, stories and dreams of the working class. Barb Schloff is one of those people. On her album, Live at the Underground, she exhibits the talents that may one day grant her the same popularity that Chapman has attained.

Recorded from two concerts at Brown University, in her home state of Rhode Island, Schloff proves that a beautiful voice has no need for the technical wizardry that a studio provides. Her simple, yet poignant lyrics also demonstrate that sometimes the best way to say something is to say it openly and honestly.

With her acoustic guitar, strong, yet delicate voice, and occasional giggles between songs, Schloff is the innocent, trusting schoolgirl. Of her poetic songs, all different slices of her life, many deal with hope and optimism.

In "Waiting," she tells her boyfriend that she'll be there when he decides to come around. She introduces "Finally Right" as a song for her brother, who finally met the right woman after years of hardships.

She calls "When I Look at You" her "song of forgiveness." The sensuous, eloquent, romantic love song is about being mad at someone, but forgiving him as soon as you see him. It's something we've all experienced, and many times wish we hadn't.

Schloff's voice also emits the same subtle anger that is apparent in the voice of Suzanne Vega. On the comedic "Mr. Bossman," she sarcastically quips to the restaurant owner that she waitresses in, "Why don't they all just get away/And we could do everything your way/And you'd have yourself a regular field day/If the world was yours."

Barb Schloff's live album, as well as her self titled debut, may be bought by sending $10 (each) to Barb Schloff, P.O. Box 1263, Newport, R.I. 02840

Where to catch nature's fireworks

By KIM BRATER
Collegian Correspondent

About Town is a new column which will review different and exciting things to do and places to see, in and around the Amherst area. About Town will contain information on places which have been around, awaiting your discovery.

As the warm summer air is taken over by brisk autumn winds, New England is slowly painted with fall foliage, and the Pioneer Valley is certainly no exception. According to local meteorologists, the leaves in the area will be at their color peak this weekend.

ABOUT TOWN

One way to enjoy the beautiful color splashes is to take a drive along the Mohawk Trail, Route 2 and Route 202. Make sure to drive in the southward direction, otherwise you will view past peak areas. Those who have previously driven on route 202S, know of the gorgeous panoramic site at the hill top which looks out over the Quabbin Resevoir. Bring your camera.

If driving is not appealing, try visiting Fullers Horse Farm in Westhampton, just a short half hour from Amherst. Fullers farm offers horseback riding for $20 per hour. Ride along their trails, or if you've never ridden a horse, take a beginners lesson to learn.

Although riding attracts many, the Hayrides at Fullers seem to be the most popular at this time of year, and the least expensive. For 12 people it costs only $5 a person.

"The rides go through the woods on our property." explained owner Percy Fuller. Since this is a busy time, Fuller suggests making arrangements one to two weeks in advance.

If you are a hiking aficionado, why not go to one of the area Conservation Lands. There's one located right on the Amherst-Pelham line. Not only will you see the coloring trees, but you will get some exercise walking along the many paths.

With fall, also comes apple picking. Some area orchards may have picking this weekend. But according to Sue Nadel, at Atkins Farm in South Amherst, "The weather has gotten too cold and everyone is trying to bring in their crops so they're not destroyed by the frost. But some may be open for picking."

Brains bounce back from break-up brilliantly

By COLIN SEARS

Quickness
Bad Brains
Caroline

It's been over 10 years since the rock group the Bad Brains formed in Washington. For these 10 years they have been virtually ignored by the public, except for a small hardcore audience. On Quickness, their latest album, the Bad Brains once again display musicianship and songwriting which shines above and completely blows away most hard-rocking bands. This album is the follow-up to their outstanding I Against I album, thus it is prone to be viewed over-critically.

Back to their original line-up, the Bad Brains still retain the energy and soulfulness found on I Against I. Their creative blend of heavy metal, reggae and funk, once again provides an album which rocks and grooves throughout.

Quickness kicks in with "Soul Craft," a heavy groove which is as entrancing as the best Led Zeppelin songs. From here on, the Bad Brains, fronted by vocalist H.R., present a myriad of styles which are all fused together in unity, regardless of their differences.

This "blending of elements" is the overall style of the album, however, "The Prophets Eye" is as conventional as most reggae, and "Sheba" is basically just another (yawn) hardcore song.

The supreme guitarmanship of Dr. Know, and constant groove of the rhythm section make even these songs, which in 1989 could be considered trite, just as invigorating as the rest of the album. In fact, these songs break up the album nicely, and make it more powerful.

If you loved I Against I, then you'll also love Quickness, but it may take a few listens to fully enjoy it. This is because fortunately, Quickness is quite different from I Against I.

The only place it really comes up short, is in the production. Once again Ron St. Germain has the role of producer, however, the sound is slightly muddled in places, and not quite as "in your face" as I Against I. The production is still good however, and many of the songs are actulaly much better thatn those on I Against I.

If you appreciate creative heavier rock with a conscience and melody and haven't yet discovered the Bad Brains, Quickness is an excellent introduction to their own brand of Rastafarian metal funk.

■ Flesh

When they refused to conform to the top 40 sound that Polydor wanted, Flesh found themselves without a record label. They soon signed with the independent Statik Records, and began to secure a core following with the EP Swing Out Sister (whose jacket sleeve of two nuns kissing was banned in parts of the United States) and the album Big Fun City.

Things really began to pick up for the band when they signed with Beggars Banquet in 1986. And when John Hughes used "I Go Crazy" as the theme tune for his movie Some Kind Of Wonderful, they had their first hit single. Derek Greening (Del Strangefish) joined the band and they released their much anticipated Long Live the New Flesh in 1987.

Produced by Mike Hedges, the album was the first real success for Flesh in the States, with "I Go Crazy" and "Postcards From Paradise" both receiving a good share of airplay.

The band could have easily recorded Long Live the New Flesh Part II and probably would have met with great success in the United States, but instead, they went for a totally different sound on Plastic Fantastic and even changed producers, opting instead for Mark Opitz, who has worked with INXS and the Divinyls.

"Michael Hedges is cool," Marsh explained. "It's just that every producer puts their own stamp on their records, and it's not good to use the same stamp over and over again."

The band, who all share in songwriting chores, also decided to record this album in Sydney, Australia. "We heard that the water goes down the drain the wrong way in Australia, and we wanted to see for ourselves," Marsh quipped.

Plastic Fantastic is by far Flesh's most mature and sophisticated album to date. Many of the songs on it, such as the title cut and "Stupid On the Street," convey some of the band's wild humor, although not to its full extent. "We'll probably write more of a comedy album soon," Marsh said.

In the meantime, the band has done some housecleaning. They replaced bassist Kevin Mills with Mike Steed, and drummer James Mitchell with Hans Perrson.

Does the thought of touring with PIL, whose leader is the outspoken and often virulent John Lydon fill them with any anxiety?

"John Lydon is like going on tour with Englebert Humperdink," Marsh said.

"He reminds me of Tom Jones," Rocco said. "He's the kind of guy who's always smoking and all the girls like him."

beneficial research because the committee will probably be divided on the issue as a range of views exist among the members.

"One person might think that socially responsible research should have direct military applications in order to build a stronger army," said Ackermann, adding that others might be opposed to research for the military.

Member Lee Edwards, professor of women's studies and English, said the committee is focussing on general research policies to enable them to more clearly gauge DOD involvement on campus.

"Before looking specifically at the extent and significance of DOD involvement, we have to look at the big picture," she said.

Edwards said the committee is considering holding a public forum to address the administration's research policies.

Dastidar said the forum is a good idea as it would educate the committee while helping to inform the campus community.

Shuldiner said the committee is also working having documents on current research grants moved from the Office of Grants and Contract Administration to the library, as part of facilitating public access to the documents.

Field hockey game postponed

A game between the University of Massachusetts field hockey team and Fairfield University was canceled yesterday because an official did not show up. UMass scrimmaged the Stags for half a game before returning home.

In other news, the Minutewomen made a dramatic leap in the NCAA's poll this week from the No. 12 spot to No. 8.

That, after a 9-0 win over the University of Maine on Sunday and a 2-0 win over Temple University on Saturday.

The Minutewomen are 8-3-1, 3-1 in the Atlantic 10 Conference where they sit in second place behind Penn State.

Patriots look to avoid road jinx at Atlanta

FOXBORO (AP) — Before the New England Patriots get too excited about having won last Sunday's home game, they should consider the plight of the Atlanta Falcons.

The Falcons also won their last home game, then embarked on a disastrous road trip on which they lost all three games. The Patriots, coming off a 23-13 win over Houston, start their own three-game journey next Sunday in Atlanta.

New England coach Raymond Berry has tried to return his players to earth after that emotional victory and remind them of the dangers of entering an opponent's arena.

"We talked about it today," Berry said yesterday. "It's going to require awareness of it and mental preparation to offset it."

He'd like his players to sustain their level of enthusiasm, particularly with Sunday's crowd rooting against them.

"It would be good to be able to do that every week," he said. "So far, I really don't have any complaints about that level. It's been pretty good in all the games."

With the Patriots struggling with a 1-3 record, they jumped back into the AFC East race by upsetting the Oilers. The Falcons are 1-4, having beaten only winless Dallas. But two of those losses were against the unbeaten Los Angeles Rams and the other two came after they squandered fourth quarter leads in Indianapolis and Green Bay.

"We've got a very young football team. They're playing enthusiastic football," Atlanta coach Marion Campbell said. "We've made some errors that hurt us."

Atlanta quarterback Chris Miller made the painful discovery of just how dangerous plaing on the road can be.

In the third quarter in the noisy Hoosierdome, Falcons' left tackle Mike Kenn didn't hear the snap count, allowing Indianapolis defensive end Ezra Johnson to race by him. Johnson sacked Miller, injuring the quarterback's ribs. Miller missed the following game but returned last week against the Rams.

"It caused us to lose our quarterback for a week," right guard Bill Fralic said of the enemy crowd. "If the noise rule [penalizing home teams for excessive crowd noise] were there to keep the crowd from being a factor, then it should have been invoked. It cost us a quarterback and cost us a game."

The Patriots will be without their own starting left tackle Sunday. Berry said Danny Villa has an arm injury and will be replaced by David Viaene.

Following the dunking contest, the team will warm up and then scrimmage for about 20 minutes.

"I want to make it an exciting time, to attract people," Calipari said. "If they come, I think they'll have fun."

Calipari is a firm believer in what fans can do for a home crowd. This is the kind of supportive atmosphere he is hoping to instill, which in turn could lead to an interesting season.

"I'm trying to create a situation where if you come into the Cage, you'd better be beating my team by 10 or 15 points to win, because my fans are going to be worth 15 to us," Calipari said. "We want to bring the Rage in the Cage back."

He likened the situation to the one at Duke University, where opponents entering the Cameron Indoor Stadium literally can crumble under the pressure of the home rowdies.

"I think that's great. There's nothing wrong with painting faces, getting rowdy, having fun and being crazy," Calipari said. "Fans can get excited and rowdy, but within the limits of being responsible."

Which means that anyone who shows up drunk will probably be refused admission. It is understandable that it will be a Saturday night, and nature dictates that people will toss a few down before heading out to have a good time. But Calipari doesn't want to spoil the atmosphere.

"We're not letting people in bombed," Calipari said. "We just want to have a classy night for everybody. We want to let the students know we need their help. We're doing it for them."

Men's soccer nips Williams, 1-0

Lawrence scores for UM

By ADRIENNE MATT
Collegian Staff

Although the officiating left something to be desired, and the fields were extremely muddy, the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team defeated Williams College 1-0 yesterday at Boyden Field.

The air was brisk and the meager crowd trickled in throughout the game to watch the first win for the Minutemen since the Massachusetts Challenge Cup Tournament.

"I saw a good team performance," said head coach Jeff Gettler. "Overall, I saw a good defensive effort, very solid."

The first half was scoreless and the play was sporadic. There were volleys for possession in the midfield and a few dangerous chances for both teams.

The only goal of the game was scored on a direct kick just inside the box tapped from senior Tom Skiba to sophomore Dan Lawrence. The arc of the ball stretched to the top left corner of the net 12 minutes into the second half.

Eleven minutes later junior Peter McEvoy received a yellow card for pushing from behind. The fouls called against were very lopsided, with Williams receiving 24, UMass 12. Despite the results of the game, Williams outshot the Minutemen 16 to 13.

"After the goal we panicked," Gettler said. "We calmed down, came out of our shell, panicked again, then settled down. In the last few minutes we were able to handle things."

Freshman Steve Armenti started the game in the goal and finished with five saves. Ephman freshman Bill Hennig completed the game with three saves.

In a scuttle in the box during the game against URI, UMass sophomore goalkeeper Jon Gruber broke his nose and has since been diagnosed with a slight cranial fracture. He has been using a helmet in practice and his injury is not expected to delay his season.

The Minutemen are currently 3-8-1 for the season and Williams drops to 6-2. Adding to his stats from this game, Lawrence is the top scorer for the season having five goals and three assists. Sophomore Ray Cunha follows with three goals and no assists. Sophomore Brett Anthony has two goals and two assists for the year.

"Just because [Williams] is a Division III team, doesn't cheapen the game," said Gettler. "I saw a great team effort. I think they beat a good team. After this, they're going to be able to feel good about themselves."

Women's tennis looks to get Tufts

By C.J. ABATI
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's tennis team has a rough weekend ahead of them. Starting this afternoon, the Minutewomen have three successive matches — two of which are on the road.

This afternoon, they travel to Medford to take on Tufts University. The Jumbos should be tough, but head coach Edwin Gentzler remains optimistic.

"They're a good team, but I like the way we have been playing," Gentzler said. "It should be tough, but I expect to do well."

The University of Rhode Island is the next match for the Minutewomen, tomorrow at 1 p.m. in Kingston, RI. The Rams play a similar schedule to UMass and are presently 5-5.

"We were supposed to play this match earlier in the season, but it was rained out," Gentzler said. "I would have liked to have played it earlier, but these things happen. Playing it now realy makes things tough on us."

The Minutewomen return home Saturday to face the University of Vermont, 1 p.m. at the Upper Boyden courts. The Catamounts should prove to be their toughest opponents. Vermont currently has a 7-5 record.

The Catamounts have a strong one-two punch in the singles competition. Jen Barfield is their top singles player, while Tammy Azur is in the number two spot. They have virtually been the teams backbone this season. The pair also teams up to play in the number one doubles spot.

Vermont took third in the recent North Atlantic Conference tournament, behind Boston Univeristy and Hartford. Hartford, a team that UMass has already beaten, defeated the Wildcats by a 6-3 score.

"I'm looking forward to playing these guys," stated Gentzler. "They're a good, tough team. It should be good college tennis. It will be a fun match."

Despite the tough scheduling, Gentzler is looking forward to improving on his team's 3-4 record.

"We've been improving with every match we play. I'm pleased with our performance so far. I don't expect any problems."

Green and Reds to clash today

By RICK SETO
Collegian Staff

The return of colder weather to New England might bring thoughts of Christmas (74 days left for you gift-shopping fanatics), but another thing might as well — the UMass Reds (8-2-2, ranked eighth in the nation) clashing with the Big Green of Dartmouth this afternoon (3 p.m.) at Hanover, NH.

Host Dartmouth (3-2-1) will have experience on their side, as they lost only one starter from last year's 7-6 team. Offensively, the Green are led by two forwards, Tracy Hagen and Dana Weintraub. Hagen, a sophomore, has four goals and an assist for nine points. Weintraub, a senior, has scored three and assisted on one score.

On paper, Dartmouth has balance in the middle of the field, with three midfielder (Jenn Martin, Becky Barenderick, Sara Pettus) with five points apiece.

"Martin is a key player for them," Rudy said. "She has terrific shooting ability from 30-40 yards, particularly on free kicks." She is a dangerous passer, with a team-high five assists.

Rudy said, "Barenderick is a workhorse. She is very good with her left foot and hit the post twice against Brown [in the Green's scoreless tie]."

Their keeper, junior Deb Tripaldi, is fairly solid, according to Rudy. She has started all of the Big Green's games and owns four shutouts to her credits.

For UMass, the lineup will be the same, albeit some injuries. Freshman Lisa Mickelson, the regular left midfielder, has been bothered all season by her hip problems and is likely to come off the bench to provide a spark.

Sophomore Tracy Arwood is available to start in Mickelson's place, as she made her first start against Florida International this past weekend. "Tracy was quite competent starting," Rudy said. "She had been doing very well coming as a sub."

Third-leading scorer Kim Eynard (4-3-11) has been hampered by knee problems and is questionable to start. If that is the case, the likely starter at one of two forward slots would be sophomore Michele Woodside (3-1-7), who has finished very well as of late.

Weapons in the offensive end will be April Kater and Sue Gaudette, the Reds' two leading scorers. Kater had a productive weekend, boosting her numbers to 7-6-20. Gaudette picked up four more points, for totals of 5-5-15.

Defensively, UMass has a new wrinkle — five defenders on the field. Rudy first pulled the maneuver against Holy Cross and proceeded to pound the Crusaders 6-0. This strategy could be a key down the road, as the Reds only have six games left.

"Against Central Florida, we had three in the back with Becky Bonzano [normally a defender] in the midfield," Rudy said. The midfield marks the third position for the junior, after playing sweeper her freshman year and a regular defender last year.

Holly Hellmuth, usually the right back, has been matched up against the forwards with a lot of the same attributes — speed and good heading/jumping ability. Sarah Szetela and Margie Jaede have split time as the opposite back, and Kim Montgomery has seemed to fit in nicely as the sweeper.

"Tactically we're making small changes when we go to five backs," Rudy said. "The midfielders and their jumping abilities, their frontrunners and the speed of the game are basic considerations for using five defenders."

Freshman Skye Eddy draws her sixth start and has lived up to all expectations. She carries an undefeated 4-0-1 record, allowing a 0.60 goals-against average. Eddy played the 1-1 Central Florida tie, and managed to keep the Golden Knights at bay during a hectic first half for UMass.

Midnight Madness coming to Cage

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

What do you get when you cross a "Rage in the Cage" with October 15?

You get "Midnight Madness," the first official practice of the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team for the 1989-90 season.

Via NCAA rules, no collegiate hoop team may practice before 12:01 a.m. on October 15. Schools such as Kansas (Late Night with Larry Brown) have traditionally turned this into a gala event for the students.

UMass head coach John Calipari and assistant John Robic were at Kansas under Brown and saw the excitement and spirit such an event could create. With this, they are attempting to bring this excitement to the Curry Hicks Cage Saturday night, as a showcase of the team for the upcoming season, and as a way to recognize and appreciate the fans for their support.

"We're doing this for the students. It's almost a give-back," Calipari said. "I thought the support for last year was terrific under the circumstances. This is the students' team, not mine and not the University's."

Calipari said that he feels this year's team is one that will bring excitement to the crowd.

"Last year I wasn't really sure of the product, the kind of kids we had," he said. "I wasn't sure I was ready to promote them. Now I feel pretty good. We're putting down the foundation for a great team."

Midnight Madness, although it is officially the first practice of the year, will feature the students more than anything else.

Among the gimmicks will be a door-prize raffle, featuring dinner prizes and two round-trip airline tickets to Florida, to be given out at various times throughout the evening. Students are asked to bring a contribution of a non-perishable food that can be donated to the New England Food Bank.

There will also be the finals in this week's 3-on-3 competition, as well as a foul-shooting contest and a half-court shooting contest. After that will be a dunking contest, which will feature the players on the team. Judging will be

Schedule for Midnight Madness

The following is the itinerary for Saturday night's Midnight Madness, to be held at the Curry Hicks Cage:

10:30 p.m. to 11:45 p.m.: 3-on-3 tournament semifinals and finals, for both men's and women's teams, and foul shooting finals. Winners will receive a pair of New Balance leather tennis shoes. Half-court shooting contests, with cash prizes.

11:45 p.m.: Lights will be turned out, introduction of the 1989-90 Minuteman basketball team.

12:01 p.m.: Team will come out and warm up, followed by dunking contest. Team will be split into two divisions, with judging to be done by students through applause meter.

Following dunking contest, the team will scrimmage for approximately 20 minutes.

During the evening, dinners prizes to various local restaurants will be raffled off, along with two round-trip airline tickets to Florida.

Students will be admitted free, but are asked to bring a contribution of non-perishable food for the New England Food Bank.

Live entertainment will be provided by WHMP-FM (99.3) in Northampton. WMUA (91.1) will also be broadcasting live.

Students may sign-up for the foul-shooting contest through Friday in the men's basketball office. Preliminary competition will be Friday at 5 p.m. at the Cage.

Tuition up again? Students perturbed

By NATHAN KRYSTALL
Collegian Staff

Students expressed several concerns yesterday over expected fee or tuition increases at the University of Massachusetts.

Chancellor Duffey said Wednesday that increases are a likelihood if the Statehouse approves Secretary of Administration and Finance L. Edward Lashman's to cut a further $35 million from the statewide University system.

UMass' budget will suffer a reduction of approximately $7 million if Lashman's plan goes into effect, said Student Trustee Eric Nakajima.

"There's a possibility of a serious tuition increase," Nakajima said, adding that the increase will not exclude the possibility of further reductions in faculty and staff, or the cancellation of more course sections at the University.

"We're talking about a possible 'pay more for less situation,'" he said.

"We're in a battle over what the level of cuts is going to be in the next three months," Nakajima said. "We'll either lose or lose seriously. The severity of the cuts depends on our ability to mobilize. If people want to get involved, the time to get involved is this coming Wednesday."

Wednesday, Oct. 18 is the scheduled date of the statewide rally against budget cuts to higher education.

Nakajima said if the University does not raise tuition or fees in response to the likely cuts, whole programs or departments will have to be eliminated.

Most of the money generated from a tuition increase will go to the state's general funds, whereas fee increases go to the University, he said.

But Becky Rovinelli, a first year student, said she can't afford to pay more money to the University.

Rovinelli, an animal science major, said she paid this semester's bill by herself and is fighting to receive financial aid.

Tour to help students of color prepare for 'success'

By SUZETTE HUNTE
Collegian Correspondent

The Black Collegian Magazine, a 19 year-old career and self-development magazine created for students of African descent, is scheduled to bring its "Going Places Career Success Tour" to the University of Massachusetts this Monday.

"Our primary purpose is to get African-American as well as other students of color thinking about co-ops and preparing early," said Phillip Manuel, special programs director to The Black Collegian.

"With the help of our corporate representatives, we want to build early and comfortable relationships between students and potential employers in order to get students focusing in on the big picture," he said.

UMass was chosen as one of the five universities nationwide to host the event this year.

Manuel said the decision "had a lot to do with the mood of the campus and the activity and personality of its minority population."

"Going Places," piloted in 1988, is a festive and informational exposition designed to encourage students of African descent, as well as other students of color, to become excited and aware about career options and the requirements for success, Manuel said.

"According to Workforce 2000, the average age of the workforce by the year 2000 will rise, and 85 percent of its new entrants will be women, people of color, and immigrants," Manuel said. "With 'Going Places', we want to prepare students of color for the many opportunities that lie ahead."

"Going Places" hopes to give students of African descent a head start through workshops dealing with issues such as resume writing, self-assessment, interviewing techniques, effective communication, and professional dress, he said.

In addition to the Black Collegian Magazine, "Going Places" sponsors include the Air National Guard, Amoco, Dow Chemical USA, Eastman Kodak, and the Olin Corporation.

The exposition will begin with an address by Dr. Frederick Tillis, associate vice chancellor for faculty relations, affirmative action, and equal opportunity. Following his remarks, there will be seminars, exhibits, special drawings, guest speakers, door prizes and more.

One of the highlights of the program is an address to be given by "motivational speaker" Patricia Russell-McCloud, Manuel said.

Students support Senate passage of Mass gay rights bill

By NATHAN KRYSTALL
Collegian Staff

Students at at the University of Massachusetts yesterday supported the State Senate's passage of a gay rights bill.

"I think it's amazing," said senior Brad Robinson. "[Approval of the bill] is long overdue."

According to yesterday's Boston Globe, several gay rights bills have been blocked by the legislature for the last 17 years. Wisconsin is the only state to have anti-discrimination laws regarding lesbians, bisexuals and gays.

The Massachusetts bill will become law only after the House either approves the Senate's version of the bill or a compromise is reached between the two versions, which contain different amendment. Gov. Dukakis must then approve the bill.

"Dukakis promised he wouldn't veto it," said Robinson, an intern with Program for Lesbian, Bisexual and Gay Concerns.

"Under the bill, if I lose my job or am kicked out of my house because I am a bisexual, I could take it to court," Robinson said.

He said a grassroots effort by the gay community final-

Busy weekend for UMass sports

● Football at UConn

Collegian Staff

As crucial games go, last weekend's win over Rhode Island was a HUGE one for the University of Massachusetts football team.

But if any one game can tell whether this rejuvenated team is for real or not, tomorrow's clash with the University of Connecticut ranks right up there. The Minutemen travel to Storrs, Conn. (1 p.m.) to battle their friendly neighbors to the South in the 60th renewal of a long-time rivalry.

UMass (2-2-1, 1-2 in Yankee Conference) hasn't beaten the Huskies since 1985, and is still stinging from a pair of tough losses in the last three years. Last year UConn came to Amherst on Homecoming weekend and rained on the parade, walloping the Minutemen 35-14.

Another toughie came in 1986 when UMass, on the threshold of winning the Yankee Conference and a berth in the Division I-AA playoffs, watched the Huskies steal the lead in the last minute and take a 21-17 win.

"With the exception of last year, they've been good football games," said UMass coach Jim Reid. "They've been close, right down to the last minute."

Tomorrow's contest could easily slip right into that mold. UMass appears to have been reborn after rolling

Durham, N.H., will be the site of three teams this weekend from the NCAA's top 10 field hockey list from the home office in Mission, Kan.

The University of Massachusetts, the No. 8 team in the country according to the NCAA poll, will square off against the University of New Hampshire, ranked No. 9, today on the Wildcats home field (2:30 p.m.). And for now, UNH is the only team that UMass coach Pam Hixon wants to think about.

"Iowa is not our concern," Hixon said. "Our concern is New Hampshire. I'm an advocate of taking things in sequence and if we look in the region and we look to see who's doing what, we are going at New Hampshire with every ounce of energy and emotion that we possibly have. They are the team that is next on our schedule."

After that game, the next team on UMass' schedule is Iowa though, and Hixon will have to map out her game plan in a New Hampshire hotel as the Minutewomen will remain there to play Iowa on the same field tomorrow (1 p.m.).

The Hawkeyes, 11-0-2 are tied with Northeastern for the No. 6 spot in the nation.

"For us to come out with two W's would be fantastic,"

Students listen to Arnoldo Garcia discuss El Salvador during Wednesday night's forum.

Speaker: El Salvador wants changes

By RONALD J. AGRELLA
Collegian Correspondent

El Salvador is a human rights nightmare, Arnoldo Garcia, a political refugee from El Salvador, said Wednesday night at a forum on the human rights violations in the U.S.-funded government.

Garcia would like to see military aid to El Salvador stopped.

"We're trying to stop U.S. aid to El Salvador . . . we believe all this aid is used to destroy life and not to help rebuild our country and to enjoy a stable life," said Garcia.

An estimated $1.5 million is spent on El Salvador a day by the United States to support the anti-communist Arena government in a civil war against the communist FMLN rebels.

"This is a chance for people to find out directly from people who were just there — what it's like and what's going on," said Judy Lieberman of CASA."

The forum was sponsored by the UMass Central American Solidarity Association and the American Friends Service Committee, Northampton, in what spokespeople for the groups consider a necessary information session on conditions there.

Garcia, 32, a former personnel manager at an El Salvadoran fishing company was threatened by government backed death squads. He was a target because he had given to many concessions to the company's union without the company owner's permission. He was labeled a communist.

"I had given the union a 10-cent raise and some limited health benefits. I later got a call from the death squad giving me 48 hours to leave the country," said Garcia, who had lost two roommates by the death squads.

"I told my family that they should at least move out of the town. When someone in your family is threatened your who family has to move, it's like a chain — your brother or another member could be next," said Garcia, a member of the National Caravan for Peace and Justice and the Civil and Human Rights of El Salvador.

Garcia said the El Salvadoran people do not support the Arena government because it violates human rights and supports death squads. He said that most of the people in El Salvador support the FMLN rebels and not the Arena government.

"There is no Freedom of expression or speech. People who speak against government would be [considered] communists. Then they [the government] would take action against you," said Garcia. "I don't believe in democracy in El Salvador because it seems to be the country's excuse to execute you."

Since the Arena government started using the death squads and estimated 7,000 persons have disappeared, Garcia said.

Garcia's left El Salvador in December of 1984, first moving to Guatemala and then to Mexico. He crossed the U.S. border illegally and went to the immigration bureau to declare political asylum, which has been pending for three years now. Garcia said the U.S. grants political asylum status to very few El Salvador refugees, mainly for political reasons.

"I crossed the Mexican-American boarder illegally but I felt so secure, and it would always be much better than El Salvador," explained Garcia.

Garcia said that for the majority of the poverty-stricken population the issue is not if the government is to be communist or democratic, but who will help the people of El Salvador.

"We don't see the point from democracy or communism, we want the one who can solve our political problems," said Garcia.

Environmental problems end with education, senator says

By ROB SIMPSON
Collegian Staff

Solutions to the clean water, health care, and drug abuse problems lie in education, Bill Golden, state senator from Weymouth, told a small assembly in the Campus Center yesterday afternoon.

Golden, now in his third term as senator, is a democratic candidate for lieutenant governor for 1990. He is a lifelong resident of Massachusetts.

"The answer is to invest in the people," he said. "If education isn't the top priority then we're in deep trouble as a state, a region, and a country."

Golden said a stronger commitment to public higher education in Massachusetts will be crucial to solving problems in the next decade, such as an increasing state deficit.

"There's no way that our kids can compete with the sons and daughters of Bonn, Tokyo, and London, unless we make the investments in our children that were made in us," he said.

Golden is well known in the state as a staunch environmentalist. He said he has been dedicated to environmental issues for some 20 years.

He said the world's perspective on the environment has changed drastically from what it was 20 years ago.

For example, he said, people used to view the sun as a source of life and health, but now people see the sun as a source of disease or destruction.

"[Environmental issues] are issues that will deal with life itself on this planet," he said.

His work for the state on the environment includes serving as chairman of the Special Commission on Indoor Air Pollution, and chairman of the Statewide Chairman of the Advisory Board for 1986 Referendum Campaign to Clean Up Hazardous Waste and Protect Our Drinking Water.

From 1985 to 1988, Golden also served as chairman of the Special Commission on Liability for the Release of Oil and Other Hazardous Materials.

In 1983, as a city solicitor in Quincy and as a special counsel, Golden initiated a lawsuit to clean up Boston Harbor and Massachusetts Bay.

Golden has also done some environmental work for the Federal Government.

He was a staff member of the Offices of Administrator in the United States Environmental Protection Agency from 1970 to 1971 and served on the President's Advisory Council on Executive Organization for the Natural Resources and Environmental Task Force in 1970.

He also worked for Ralph Nader in the early 1970s, and was known as one of "Nader's Raiders." In 1972, Golden served on the Nader Congressional Study Project of the House and Senate Public Works Committees and Highway Trust Fund.

Fire Prevention Week hopes to alarm students to danger

By KENNETH MAGUIRE
Collegian Correspondent

National Fire Prevention Week, Oct. 8 to 15, is underway across the country and here at the University of Massachusetts in an effort to heighten student awareness of fire safety.

"We've set up information tables in every dining common on campus for each night of the week," said David Beaudin, associate fire prevention officer for the Environmental Health and Safety Division at the University.

Last year there were 33 reported fires on campus, 18 of which were in buildings, injuring one employee and two students, totaling just over $13,000 in damage, down $8,000 from the previous year, said Beaudin.

"I feel that the students today are more aware of fire safety than those of the past," said Beaudin, "but we still have a problem with malicious false alarms, which accounted for 42 percent of all alarms pulled last year."

Many of the students disciplined for pulling false alarms often must accompany a fire safety official on a typical weekend night.

"It's an eye opening experience for them," commented Beaudin. "They really get a feel for what fire safety is all about. They realize people can be hurt and its no longer a laughing matter."

While there is special emphasis on fire safety this wee, Beaudin and his staff of eight work year round at educating students and workers alike.

"We train a wide variety of people throughout the University about the hazards of fire and fire safety procedures," said Beaudin "From resident assistants to PVTA bus drivers, we train them all."

Beaudin, in his 11th year of fire prevention at UMass, feels the students have an opportunity to learn valuable information, not just for the week, but for the future as well.

"The University will have to offer more financial aid to cover the increases," she said. "Otherwise UMass will become more elitist."

Junior Jonathan Waxler, who receives a tuition waiver because his father is a professor in the state university system, said the University should increase tuition or fees.

"The University is in such a bad position that the only way to keep it at the same academic level is to raise tuition or fees," he said.

Waxler, a STPEC major, also said there must be a plan for those who cannot afford the increases and that the University should partly cut tuition waivers for students like himself, whose parents can afford to pay their children's tuition bills.

Sophomore Guy St. Rose, a foreign student from St. Lucia, said his future at the University is "at stake" because he budgeted his money based on the University's cost when he first came here.

"I was accepted to this university under the condition that I would pay a certain amount of money for tuition," said St. Rose, a sociology major. "Now that it's gone up so outrageously, I don't know how I will manage."

Senior Karen Cartwright said that although she works to put herself through school, she can afford the increases.

"People can get the money, either through loans or working more during the summer," said Cartwright, a sociology major.

ly convinced the legislature to pass the bill.

"It's about time," said Tony Noones, a junior theater major. "But it will take a couple of years for people to start seeing gay, lesbian and bisexual people as part of their community and not just as being on their own island."

Noones said President Bush has not yet spoken out on oppression towards gay, lesbian and bisexuals.

"I look for some kind of hope that the president will tackle all kinds of oppression," he said.

He said as the statewide battles for gay rights gain momentum, it will place more pressure on the White House to take a stance on the issue.

Senior Caterina Betancourt said she supports the bill and that federal laws should be enacted to protect against discrimination towards lesbian, bisexual and gay people.

"[Sexual preference] is not a reflection of someone's ability to do a job," Betancourt said.

"A changing of laws is just the first step in the changing of attitudes," said a student who did not wish to be identified.

Dance for racial unity scheduled by Baha'i Club

By KERRY HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

The Baha'i Club will sponsor a "Race Unity" dance, tomorrow at 9 p.m. at the Bluewall. Tickets will be $2 at the door.

The Baha'i Club is a registered student organization which sponsors a dance such as this every semester, consists of about 20 members, according to Laleh Rahimi.

Rahimi, member of the organization, said racism is a major issue on campus and it needs to be addressed. Besides sponsoring dances, the club holds workshops every week on diversity in the University of Massachusetts community.

"[The University of Massachusetts] is a diverse community. We need to be able to appreciate this diversity because it is a beautiful thing," Rahimi said.

The club expects a good turnout of about 200 people based on past dances which they have held. They will have a wide range of music from disco to progressive styles.

Sophomore, Susan Corneliussen, said of the upcoming event, "While it provides entertainment, it also reminds us that we each contribute to a world of differences."

Rahimi said that she hopes that this dance will encourage students not only to have a good time but to realize why they are there.

Rahimi said, "This [racism] is a foremost issue and students have to learn to deal with it. People accept diversity and work to accept it."

Housing booked in Holyoke

HOLYOKE (AP) — City officials plan to stop taking applications for public housing next month because waiting lists are so long.

The average wait for an apartment is nearly nine years.

According to figures released last week by Raymond P. Murphy Jr., executive director of the Holyoke Housing Authority, 766 families are currently on the list. He said the average wait for non-emergency cases is 8.8 years.

Murphy was at a conference in Seattle and could not be reached at his hotel Thursday morning, but he has called the waiting time "a disgrace."

However, Cheryl Kishlo of the state executive office of community development said that in Massachusetts "a seven-to-nine year wait is not all that unusual for a large urban housing authority."

She said that typically when vacancies become available they are filled from priority lists of families that have lost their homes to fire and other causes. Holyoke's waiting list for regular applicants was actually shorter last year than many other similar cities including Lowell, Malden and Springfield, she said. She did not have comparable figures for this year.

The state agency approved Holyoke's request to close its waiting lists on Sept. 29, she said.

Several other urban housing authorities have taken similar steps, she said. The state allows authorities to close the lists when applicants have a wait of more than four years and they have met minority placement requirements. However, the authorities must continue to accept emergency cases, she said.

Feds: UAL engine was cracked

WASHINGTON (AP) — Federal safety investigators said yesterday that they had found an apparently pre-existing crack in the engine disk discovered in an Iowa corn field nearly three months after the crash of an airliner that killed 112 people.

James Kolstad, acting chairman of the National Transportation Safety Board, said the precise 'size, nature and reason for the crack' has yet to be determined.

"There has been no determination on whether this crack was detectable before the accident, nor has there been a determination whether this crack is the point of origin of engine failure," said board spokesman Ted Lopatkiewicz. He said it had not been determined whether the crack should have been caught in the last engine inspection before the crash.

Ex-con charged with bank job

SPRINGFIELD (AP) — A man who had been cleared of killing another inmate at a Florida prison, has been charged with robbing a Springfield bank.

An innocent plea was entered in Springfield District Court for Willie A. Brown of Agawam at his arraignment Wednesday on charges of robbing a branch of the Bank of New England West on Oct. 2. Judge George A. Sheedy ordered Brown held on $50,000 bail.

Brown, 39, was released last March from a Florida state prison where he had spent five years on death row after being convicted of killing another inmate while serving a sentence for armed robbery.

Florida officials dropped the charges after Esther Lichtenfels, who had befriended and later married Brown, and a private detective she hired were able to discredit the testimony of a third inmate, who had maintained that he saw Brown leaving the dead man's cell.

The definition of sexually explicit expression is a highly individual issue that touches on not only First Amendment rights, but also on the effect it has on women and society.

Danielle Bionda

My definition of what is offensive is probably very different than yours. And I have no right to tell you what you may or may not view, in the privacy of your own home, as long as you don't make me look at it.

But the restriction of sexually explicit materials will not in any way help the women's movement. Censorship and legislation against pornography or sexually explicit expression is not the answer to women's oppression. It is a quick solution to a very deeply rooted problem in our society, and would in fact give more power to the court system, (which does not have a history of supporting women's rights.)

Instead of legislation restricting pornography, our legal energy should be focused on enacting stricter laws against rape and violence against women.

In 1986, Attorney General Edwin Meese's Commission on Pornography attempted to "determine the nature, extent, and impact on society of pornography in the United States. . ."

The heart of the Meese Commission recommendations was the re-enforcement of existing obscenity laws and the passage of new legislation because women are "harmed by pornography."

The Meese Commission's findings gave groups like the National Federation for Decency, Citizens for Decency through Law and the National Coalition Against Pornography a huge victory by the implementation of new regulations of "obscenity" by our system. But what exactly is pornography? Playboy? Hustler? MTV videos? And how are women harmed by obscenity — is it sexual violence, rape and battering, or more subtle forms of degredation, like racism, harassment, objectivication and sexism?

What the Commission failed to realize was that an acceptable definition for what constitutes "pornography" or "obscenity" (or anything, for that matter) is impossible to conclude.

And if we cannot make a universal definition of "pornography" or "obscenity," who will be the one to hand down to us what kind of material (whether it be pornographic, artistic, political, etc.) is socially acceptable?

Women are not harmed only by sexually explicit material — by sexual images — but are harmed by the perpetuation in society of images and beliefs that are degrading, and sexist. These images are not only present in pornographic material, they are everywhere — on T.V., in advertisements, in the classroom, in church, at home, and even in the government.

Pornography is society's cause, or the scapegoat that is taking the blame for our "lost morality;" while rape, violence against women and children, sexism, racism and the objectivication of women continues to be the effect.

"Legal remedies" do not address the real issue of physical and subliminal violence against women. They would give control to the state to determine what is or is not obscene or pornographic, when this should be an individual choice.

Hiding and denying our sex

The idea of censoring any material that does not fall obviously into the category of obscene and vulgar is absurd, at least within the boarders of a constitutional democracy. However, the reasons that certain groups are calling for a ban on some of these publications is worthy of discussion.

David Martin

Some of these groups make the following claim — displaying the naked female body is a form of object, and that it encourages men to view women as objects of sexual desire, to be leered at and discarded. This is not a direct quote, only my interpretation of what I've read of feminist's objections to pornography. Often these objections accompany some statistical evidence showing a link in pornography sales and violence against women.

The problem with rape is, as we all know, a matter of power, not sex. It's an act of hatred and violence. It is not sexual, except, perhaps in the sense of sexual hatred. The men who rape are suffering from a sickness, in the same way that racial hatred causing men to lynch Blacks is a sickness. However, not all men are racist, just as not all men are misogynistic.

Sexual hatred came from stereotypes like the whore/Madonna dichotomy, i.e. good girls/bad girls and all that crap. Pornography, if done tastefully, brings sex out of the dark and helps dispel the myths about women. Admittedly though, those myths will die hard. Remember in the 1960s when the spirit of liberation first came alive in women, one of the first things they did was tear off their bras as a symbol of revolution against old social rules that kept them barefoot and home with the you-know-whats. Well, it's 20 years later and suddenly women want to cover up and hide their sexuality again.

It seems that somebody has convinced them that they were being leered at. Well, leer back? There's nothing wrong with it. Men and women are supposed to look at each other. It's good for you. It develops good, healthy heterosexual attitudes.

Of course, it can be taken too far. No one should be the subject of a barrage of wolf-whistles and cat-calls if they don't like it, but criticizing men for sincere remarks of admiration is just paranoia.

Banning pornography that contains sex and violence will help to reduce the incidents of violence, but let's not fall into our old ways of denying sex by hiding all the pictures and not talking about it. By the way, I recently read that the Chinese government has cracked down on pornography. It seems that suppressing individual rights is a big thing to do in China these days.

A job, not sexual discrimination

Pornography, such as Playgirl, Playboy and Penthouse are not harmful to society. Penthouse and Playboy contribute to the negative image of women and the discriminatory treatment of women, the same way a claim could be made about Playgirl. Pornography is not about sexual discrimination, it's about people using their bodies to make money. Those people seen in porno-mags are paid to do what they do, you can bet it's not minimum wage! The models live the life they want. If you feel like buying a dirty magazine, you're free to do so.

The statistics are harrowing

Okay, let's say it one more time and let's get it right. I know of no organized feminist initiative to "ban" pornography, and I've been a feminist activist for eight years.

Lierre Keith

What your paper seems to be confused about is the civil rights ordinance drafted by Catherine MacKinnon and Andrea Dworkin. This ordinance has been voted into law in three cities. But because of the power, money and brutality of the corporate media, the pornographers and organized crime, no woman has ever been able to use it.

The ordinance is not a criminal law. It doesn't "ban" anything. There is no prior restraint. It is a civil. It says very simply that women can sue the pornographers. It says if a woman is forced into pornography, she can sue the makers and distributer of that pornography. And it says that if a woman has pornography forced on her, she can sue. The definition of pornography in the ordinance is not some vague question of morality. The definition simply describes what pornography is: the sexual subordination of women.

Suddenly no one knows what pornography is. Pornographers know what to make. Store owners know what to get. Men know what to buy. But where do you draw the line, everyone puzzles. How about where men's pleasure means women's blood? Or where men's "speech" means women's silence, women's death.

The First Amendment absolutists argue that there is an abstract system called "speech." Strengthening it in one place strengthens it everywhere. What they don't see is that there are other systems, like male supremacy and White supremacy. These are not abstract. They are in fact very real and very bloody. Seen from this angle, strengthening male supremacy in one place strengthens it everywhere. Strengthening the KKK strengthens racism. Strengthening the pornographers strengthens the power of men.

It is women who are embattled and women who are censored. The Minneapolis city council held public hearings where some very brave and very tenacious women testified about what the pornographers and their industry had done. You can get a transcript of their testimony if you go to England. No one will publish it here. Andrea Dworkin — who has arguably done more for women than anyone in this century — has eight books of both theory and fiction to here credit, but no one will publish her work either. The New York Times has a stated policy that it will not report feminist anti-pornography activity. Meanwhile, women are dying.

I am not going to argue about "proof." I have enough proof. Every nine seconds a man beats a woman. Forty-four percent of women will be victims of rape and attempted rape. Thirty-eight percent will be sexually abused before the age of 18. (That's 13 million little girls, right now.) Every hour and 50 minutes, a serial sex killer tortures a woman to death. They always use pornography. Sometimes they make it as well. This is my proof. Women's blood is my proof. Women's terror and women's pain and men's seemingly endless desire to do it to us is my proof.

To women I want to say: This is the first generation of men raised on pornography. The statistics are harrowing. They are soon going to be unimaginable. Men will not stop until we stop them.

To men I want to say: Your kingdom has come and your kingdom will fall.

Lierre Keith is a UMass student

Perpetuating myth in every issue

Yes I do believe that pornographic magazines should be banned. But before you start screaming about the First Amendment — wait.

I don't care what anyone tells you — men don't buy Penthouse for the "articles." They buy them for the sexual satisfaction of "owning" beautiful naked women who are always waiting for their bottom drawer for their own viewing pleasure whenever they want.

Maybe there is great literature to be found in "Cheri?"

Objectification of women is a primary tool of oppression. It strips away a woman's qualities as a human being and focuses on what we all have been taught is the "real" importance of women — their looks and their body.

Pornographic magazines perpetuate this myth in every issue that is sold!

Not only does this hurt women in society's view, but it is destroying the chances for women to achieve a positive self-image as well.

The percentage of women who look like Playboy models when their clothes are off is low, very low. This means that women are being confronted with a body image that they cannot achieve — at least not without being bulemic or anorexic.

O.K., now you can scream about the First Amendment. You may think this is a violation of the right to free speech but as women, our rights have already been violated by the industry that turns women into masturbation tools.

Stopping pornographic exploitation of is a tangible victory in the fight to end oppression against women.

The Disc Junkie marches forward to Newage

By JON DRUKMAN
Collegian Staff

Last weeks bit of raving egoism completely failed to win us letter bombs. It did, however, win us a tape by a couple of fellows from St. Louis. The fellows in question go by the name the Spillman Boys, and their debut cassette, on a label that they themselves created is called Newage. Pronounced "noo-idj," they define it as adj. a hybrid of quasi-religious musical idioms from the late twentieth century. n. settlings or dregs of cosmic sweetness and light cesspool (see also sewage).

After wading through this hyperbole, we stuck the tape in the player and found an interesting hybrid of quasi-religious . . . no, just kidding. What we found were some interesting experimentations in the realm of electronic music.

The tape opens with "Processional," which sounds very much like a renegade from the Synergy album, but feels rather stiff. The rest of the side takes us into the realm of found sounds and spacey music. Voices bounce around, the music tinkles and belches ominously, and the whole thing reminds us a lot of early Negativland. The overall effect is rather suggestive of standing inside an active volcano.

DISC JUNKIE

Side two is more structured, in a conventional sense. "Adrenaline" is an aptly-titled kick off, sounding like Birdsongs Of The Mesozoic during one of their more frenzied moments. The centerpiece is the tripartite "Digital Dog Days." This piece packs a bit of a wallop, with some seriously funky drum programming and a beautiful flute line. The closing track, "Equinox '87" may be attempting to parody new age music, but it falls right into the trap itself in the process.

You won't see this tape in the stores, as Baby Alpha Communications is what is known as a "vanity" label, or "bedroom" label by those with less kind inclinations. Write to them at P.O. Box 1675, St. Louis, 63101 and ask for details about "Newage." You might be pleasantly surprised.

One record that you probably will be able to find in record stores is an album called "March" by a fellow named Michael Penn. It contains exactly one amazing track, a handful of so-so songs, and a few complete bombs. Penn is not going to win any awards for dazzling originality, so the song quality varies depending on what artist(s) he is attempting to sound like. The lead track, "No Myth" is a fantastic song, featuring Penn borrowing heavily from The Beatles, although for some strange reason he reminds us of Squeeze also. Lots of fancy chord changes, some throwaway production tricks, and a humble as all hell chorus place this firmly in the school of successful Lennon/McCartney rips. Sadly, Penn never reaches this pinnacle again. "Half Harvest" sounds a lot like a James Taylor song, a state of affairs that we can only describe as "deplorable." Fortunately, Penn recovers on "Brave New World," which is another Beatles steal. In an attempt to throw us some changes, Penn enlists the help of Wendy and Lisa on "Bedlam Boys" and completely blows his chance by making them sound utterly generic.

This is a hard album to hate. Penn has nice intentions, a passable voice and a handful of good melodies, including one absolutely killer one. The word that best sums up this record is "harmless." There are a million better things to spend your money on, and probably a million worse things as well.

Beat generation refuses to be beaten at UMass

By ALISA HABIB
Collegian Correspondent

Wednesday night, deep in the heart of Southwest, was the season premiere of a hip concept called the Beat Cafe.

For three hours, Hampden Theatre was transformed into a small informal club setting, complete with candle lit tables and a dusky intimate atmosphere. The setting was an attempt to revive the "Beatnik" counterculture of the 50's, the theme of the Beat Cafe. The premiere act, upon completion of "Four months of therapy," was The Mess, which is comprised of former Malarians. The band played a variety of happy, upbeat, folk rock tunes, starting with "Favorite Things." It's optimistic tone and and strong rhythm set the mood for the rest of the performance.

Led by showman Mal Thursday, the band played a variety of of songs about simple life situations, including dogs, children, ad sharecroppers. Some of their other material included "She's on Fire," which Thursday quipped was "about a woman on fire," and a more mellow tune called "Killed With Love." The Mess was followed by the exceptional 12-string guitarist David Aaronoff, who performed both original music and various covers that ranged from the Beatles to They Might Be Giants. His smooth, warm voice brought out his personality, while still doing justice to the songs. One of his originals was dedicated to Jerry Reuben of the Chicago Seven. The song, "I'll Never Be Like You," was about Reuben's change from hippiedom to yuppiedom. Aaronoff called him "a man supporting all he hoped to prevent."

Following Aaronoff, fiction writer Tom Greene, dressed completely in black, ascended the stage to read work he had finished that afternoon. His compelling story "Pillars of Salt," involved the life of a deeply religious and troubled man living in a horror-stricken world, after existing after the Armageddon. His vivid images of pain and suffering drew the audience into his fantasy world.

The final act was pianist Peter Garland. Originally from New York City, he played some of his original pieces and finished with Billy Joel's "Summer Highland Falls." Garland was visibly nervous throughout his performance and slipped up on occasion.

The band Burnt Toast was unable to perform due to technical difficulties, but this did not take away from the overall enjoyable evening.

'Force' gathers food for needy

By LISA SHAPIRO
Collegian Staff

The UMass Hunger Task Force has progressed from a late 70s political and educational organization to a group which provides direct community hunger relief, said Rolf Fishburn-Parker, a three-year member of the group.

"Our philosophy stresses action more than ideology," Fishburn-Parker said.

He said this year the group will concentrate on gathering food, volunteering in soup kitchens, and bringing the Fast for World Harvest to campus.

"I feel we have a responsibility to take care of those people who are not making it and help them get to a point where they are able to take care of themselves," he said.

To collect food the task force brings shopping lists from soup kitchens to local supermarkets. Shoppers on their way into the stores are asked to purchase one can of non-perishable food and to drop it off on their way out. The group plans to do this about once a month, he said.

"It's fun," Fishburn-Parker said. "We have a really good time." This summer the task force had one member working at the "Not Bread Alone" soup kitchen each weekend, he said. The kitchen, housed in the First Congregational Church of Amherst, serves weekend lunches.

Fishburn-Parker said they plan to volunteer once a week throughout the semester. In addition to preparing the food and serving it family-style to approximately 30 people each meal, the group handles basic kitchen duties and cleans up after the meal.

These weekend meals "fill an important gap, because the soup kitchen in North Amherst is only open during the week days," he said.

"The Amherst community we serve is made up of different types of people," Fishburn-Parker said. "Basically, we serve anyone with a need for food."

Thefood provided at the soup kitchens is bought from the Western Massachusetts Food Bank. He said the group will try to raise money for the soup kitchen to purchase more food.

The group, which depends on donated land to grow food for soup kitchens, has recently acquired an acre of land from Matt Orr, who owns 40 acres in Chesterfield, Fishburn-Parker said.

The organization last night held a meeting to elect officers.

Ask Us

The third annual AIDS Awareness Week begins this weekend with some startling realities — there are more than 100,000 diagnosed cases of AIDS in the United States and more people are testing HIV positive than ever before. The number of AIDS cases for people ages 13 to 19 has more than doubled in the past two years. AIDS is now touching a wider range of people, including UMass students.

Recently, the American College Health Association of Rockville, Md., studied 19 major colleges and universities nationwide, and determined that up to 10 out of every 1,000 college student test HIV positive. To ensure that the sample was completely random and to ensure the privacy of those involved, blood samples were tested that had originally been drawn for other diagnostic purposes. The individuals whose blood was tested did not know their blood was tested for HIV antibodies.

Representatives from participating schools were given the choice whether or not to disclose each individual school's rate of HIV positive testing. They agreed unanimously to withhold that information, for fear they would labelled "the AIDS college" because of their rates of infection. Thus, we can only say that up to 10 out of every 1,000 students at UMass may test HIV positive. At a school the size of UMass, that could be as many as 30 to 70 students.

This does not mean, however, that as many as 70 or more students at UMass have AIDS. The AIDS test is, in fact, a test for the presence of HIV antibodies in the blood. The presence of these antibodies means you have been exposed to the AIDS virus, and can transmit it to others. An HIV positive test does not mean you have AIDS. It is uncertain at this time whether everyone who tests HIV positive will develop AIDS.

Obviously, this means AIDS is a reality on this campus. This is not meant to scare you, but rather to help you gauge the relative safety of your sexual habits and drug use. We do not suggest everyone be tested. For more information call collect at 617-522-4090, or call G. Krull, director of the Peer Sexuality Program at UMass, at 549-2671.

Little's works of art finds home in Amherst

By LINDA WOODS
Collegian Correspondent

The subject of one of Michael Little's paintings is a single chair — a plain, simple chair.

Yet he invests in this chair a distinct significance. He combines pastels to produce a depth which seems to extend far beyond the gallery wall.

Michael Little defines this significance as his "treatment of subject matter, handling of the medium on the paper and presentation and temperature of the works." With all of these factors combined, Michael Little's intent is to "elicit a response from the viewer."

His work will be on display at the R. Michaelson Galleries in in Amherst from Oct. 13 to Oct. 31. The opening reception is tonight from 5 p.m. to 8 p.m., and all are welcome to attend.

Michael Little is presently completing the BFA program at UMass as a painting major. He has an extensive undergraduate exhibition record, including 2 solo shows at Wheeler Gallery. He has been awarded various commissions and honors for his work. In addition, Michael is the current Vice Chair for the UMass Arts Council.

"What first attracted me to his work," explained Rich Michaelson of R. Michaelson Galleries, "was the textures he gets with his pastels. It is a softness which creates tension." Michael describes this as tension as "deliberate."

He attempts to demonstrate to his viewer that, "What we take as the norm can be tweaked just enough to give a tone that resonates with difference, it's that direction that difference takes that I find intriguing."

The show will also include Michael's sculptural work — sculptures which are often constructed of metal scraps he has found. Michael states that this aspect of his work is "deliberate in its frontal intrusion. The seams are left ragged; some surfaces unpolished."

Yet between the soft pastels of his paintings and the rough edges of his sculpture, there is a meeting point. Rich Michaelson commented on the "interrelatedness" of the artist's work.

The show is set up in a in a circular format so that the viewer can "sense the completeness of his work," Michaelson says.

Michael Little is new to R. Michaelson Galleries. He joins an impressive collection of local, as well as internationally respected artists, in Amherst's first downtown, street-level art gallery. "The Valley has a wealth of artistic talent." said Michaelson. His gallery is one of the very few showplaces in the area for this talent. Accomplished Amherst artists like Mark Meunier, John Grillo and Brendan Connors, share space with the more familiar Pierre-Auguste Renoir, John Lennon and Andy Warhol.

The R. Michaelson Gallery is an invaluable resource for artists, collectors, students and browsers alike. Rich Michaelson would like to see it become "some sort of focal point," for the Amherst community. He said, "even with the University, there's been no art hangout. In our Northampton gallery, artists drop in, use the phone, bring in new work and take down their old stuff and hang it themselves.

This is a place to see what local artists are doing. I hope people get into making it a regular stop."

Hixon said. "But we are putting all of our energies into our regional competition first because in the big scheme of things it will become more important."

It will be more important come post season time when the NCAA picks the teams for the national tourney. At the present moment, UMass is No. 3 in the Northeast region behind Providence College (No. 1) and Northeastern. UNH, 10-2, after having occupied the No. 3 spot above the Minutewomen a few weeks ago holds the No. 4 slot. The top team in the region will receive an automatic bid to the NCAA's tournament in November.

"For the region itself, there needs to be some distinctions drawn now," Hixon said. "It's ig. There's no doubt about it, it's big."

What are the distinctions between UMass and UNH? On paper, the two teams are very even. UM freshman goaltender has given up nine goals in 10 games. UNH goalie Stacey Gaudette has given up nine goals in twelve games. UMass, however, has been struck with a heavy blow in its defensive corps.

Freshman Kathy Phelan, who shut out one of the nation's most dangerous forwards last weekend in Temple's Jane Catanzaro, is sidelined with tendinitis.

"How much action she'll (Phelan) see remains to be seen," Hixon said. "She hasn't practiced this week. So, it's how she's feeling and how much she can really take."

Liz Brickley is UNH's leading scorer with 10 goals and two assists. Shelley Robinson has contributed four goals and six assists for the Wildcats. But Phelan not being at 100 percent may be felt more in the Iowa game. The Hawkeyes have a couple of dangerous forwards in Kristy Gleason and Erica Richards who both have 16 goals. But, forget about that for now.

"Both games are very big, but like I said, the UNH game in our minds, that's the one we're going after," Hixon said. "Saturday almost doesn't exist today (Thursday). Saturday exists Friday night."

over Rhody last Saturday. Connecticut got bumped down the Yankee Conference ladder a little, losing to Villanova in six overtimes, 41-35.

After six overtimes, the Huskies (3-2, 1-1) could easily take this week off. But given the circumstances, they'll probably use that to get themselves riled up even more.

"We were upset when we lost to Richmond [in four overtimes in 1987]," Reid said. "What you need to do after that is really get ready with your mental preparation."

For various reasons, the focal points on each side tomorrow will probably be the quarterbacks. Connecticut has 1988 Yan Con Player-of-the-Year Matt DeGennaro behind center. So far, he's completed 104 of 176 passes for 1,194 yards and eight touchdowns.

"The thing about Matt DeGennaro is that he's multidimensional," Reid said. "He can run and pass, and he's a great leader."

He has a pair of talented receivers in Mark Didio and Mike Nolan, and can also hand off to tailback Scott Vibberts or fullback Mark Landolfi.

On the other side, redshirt freshman Gary Wilkos gets his second start at QB for the Minutemen. Named the Yankee Conference Rookie-of-the-Week for his performance against Rhode Island, Wilkos has been battling a rib injury sustained in that game.

"I believe he'll be OK," Reid said of Wilkos, who practiced yesterday and said recently he'll be ready to go. "He's still not 100 percent, but he improved a lot from Tuesday to Wednesday."

The thing Reid is worried about is how Connecticut reacts to the option offense. UMass held out on announcing that Wilkos was starting last week until the last minute, hoping to catch Rhode Island by surprise. But Wilkos is definitely number one tomorrow, with Tom Fasano and Paul Tornatore as his back-ups.

"We're not going to surprise anybody. We've got to button our chin straps," Reid said. "We have to believe that what we did last week will work every week if we execute. We blitzed more in the Rhode Island game than we have all year."

He is aware that the blitz can give up big plays just as easily as create them, but feels it needs to be done if the Minutemen are to contain DeGennaro.

Reid was encouraged with his team's performance last week, but says that an equal performance will be needed to beat UConn.

"I'm really excited with the way we played football [against Rhode Island]," Reid said. "It was a great memory for our players. If we play that way this week, it could be another good memory."

Reds kick around Dartmouth, roll 5-1 over Green

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team had an easy time with Dartmouth yesterday, winning 5-1.

By RICK SETO
Collegian Staff

HANOVER, N.H. – If Dartmouth was the Big Green yesterday, the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team was the Bigger Reds, stomping on Dartmouth, 5-1.

UMass (9-2-2) got on the board three times in the first half, the first coming when Holly Hellmuth hit a long shot toward Dartmouth goalkeeper Debbie Tripaldi. Tripaldi stopped the shot but wasn't able to hold on, and Sue Gaudette jumped on the rebound and banged home her sixth goal of the year at the 12-minute mark.

Though UMass started off in a defensive mode, the Big Green was unable to capitalize with their aggressive forwards. On a counterattack, junior April Kater scored her eighth goal as she lobbed the ball over Tripaldi on a set-up from Kim Montgomery.

The Reds added another goal late in the half, what coach Jim Rudy termed as the goal that sealed the game. Senior Colette Bowler took a pass from Gaudette, who hustled after a loose ball and beat Tripaldi. Bowler had an easy goal into an open net.

"I liked the way we were able to stay focused enough at the end of the half," Rudy said. "That goal was the one that locked the game up."

The defense was quite impressive, holding Dartmouth without a shot on net in the first half. In the second half UMass came out strong early, tacking on two more goals in the first 10 minutes of the half.

Freshman Kim Eynard scored her fifth goal of the year as she was the beneficiary of a great individual move on Kater's part.

"Kater ran down the end line, beat her defender and passed it to Kim in front of the net," Rudy said. "Kim knocked it in."

Four minutes later Michele Woodside would score on an unassisted goal, putting UMass on top, 5-0. Rudy was able to shuttle in his bench early in the second half.

Dartmouth would save some face on its home field as Becky Barenderick scored with one minute left, hitting a high ball that was just past the outstretched hands of UMass goalkeeper Skye Eddy.

Free kicks: UMass outshot Dartmouth, 19-7. Eddy made six saves for the Reds, while Tripaldi made nine for Dartmouth . . . the Reds have not lost when they have scored at least one goal (9-0-2), and have yielded more than a goal just once (2-0 opening loss to Virginia).

Men's teams take on East squads this weekend

● Water polo heads to Navy

After completing a three-meet regular season schedule, which included five of the nations top 20 teams, the University of Massachusetts men's cross country team will finally get to play the role of the pre-race favorite this Saturday in Smithfield, Rhode Island at the Eastern Conference Championships.

Traditionally, the Minutemen's major competition at the Easterns has come from Division II powers Keene State and Lowell with the same probably holding true for this year. Some additional pressure could also come from the New Hampshire.

The Minutemen, a team with very little room for error, can ill afford to have any type of lapses this Saturday if they intend to win the team Championship.

"Were not good enough to have any dead spots," said coach Ken O'Brien. "We have seven good runners and we need all of them to run near the front pack."

This solid seven that O'Brien speaks of includes seniors Art Smith, Joe Livorsi, and Herb Heffner, as well as underclassmen Mike Davis, Pat Reed, Matt Simon, and Jon Corso.

Out of this seven has come the Minutemen's top five, but unfortuately never in any predictable order.

"Two runners near the front pack of races just isn't enough," said O'Brien. "We need four or five to be consistently sucessful."

—JON REIDEL

● Men's X-country the favorite

University of Massachusetts water polo coach Russ Yarworth knows exactly how much is on the line this weekend when his swimmers travel to Annapolis, Md., to face Bucknell in the first round of the Eastern Varsity tournament Saturday at 1:30 p.m.

"I think if we knock them [Bucknell] off, it will guarantee us a spot in the Eastern Champioships," Yarworth said.

Bucknell is ranked No. 20 in the nation by the NCAA. The Minutemen had held a spot in the NCAA's elite top 20 for the first few weeks of the season, climbing as high as No. 16. But in the midst of a midseason slump, UMass, 6-6, has dropped out of the rankings.

"That [the Bucknell game] is kind of a pivotal game because we've been in a slump lately. We've got to start to communicate more as a team."

Should the Minutemen win on Saturday, they will play the winner of the Brown/Washington and Lee game. Looking past that game, the other bracket consists of the Naval Academy (who has the home pool advantage), Harvard, the United States Military Academy and Richmond. Realistically, Yarworth feels, his troops can take two out of three games this weekend if the Minutemen break out of this rut.

"We've been playing a lot as individuals," Yarworth said. "And it's not an ego problem. It just hasn't been clicking."

Men's tennis swats UNH

The University of Massachusetts men's tennis team ran its record to 7-1, beating New Hampshire, 5-1 yesterday in Durham, N.H.

Surprisingly, number one singles player Barry Wadsworth dropped his first match of the season, losing to UNH's Brian Bauer, 5-7, 7-5, 7-5. But the Minutemen took the remaining five singles matches to clinch the win. With the match in hand, both teams agreed to cancel the doubles competition.

Paul Audet (6-3, 6-2), Jeff Hechemy (6-7, 6-2, 6-4), Lloyd Teitelbaum (6-2, 6-0), Rich Stone (6-1, 6-3) and Chris Johnson (6-0, 6-4) all got singles wins for the Minutemen. UMass finishes its season tomorrow at Clark University.

Women's cross country takes on three N.E. teams

The University of Massachusetts women's cross country team will travel to New Hampshire today for a quad-meet with the University of New Hampshire, Vermont and Rhode Island.

Coach Julie LaFreniere pulls no punches about Vermont. "Vermont will definitely be among the top three in the New England Championships," LaFreniere said. "They're always tough both physically and mentally."

Despite the loss of number one runner Sari Agrillander, one of the top runners in New England last season, to graduation, Vermont still has a strong nucleus. UVM is led by sophomores Julie Dutra and Natalie Cartwright and veterans Brenda White and Joyce Anderson.

While Vermont poses a formidable challenge, URI and UNH are both decent teams which lack depth. "URI looks good; they have an outstanding freshman, Stephanie Ulicny, who can run with our top three," LaFreniere said. "After their top four, however, they have a big gap."

UNH looks to be the weakest of the four teams, having lost to URI three times this season.

Men's soccer travels to St. Josephs for A-10 game

For the fourth time this season, the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team will hit the road. This time the destination is Philadelphia, as the Minutemen meet St. Joseph's University tomorrow at 2 p.m.

St. Joseph's is currently 3-7-2 for the season, ranked one notch higher than UMass in the Atlantic 10 ratings.

"This game we want to go out pressure-oriented, man-for-man," said head coach Jeff Gettler. "We need to go out and give another good, solid defensive performance."

Leading scorer for the Hawks this year (and last year) is senior Jack Comey with four goals and one assist. This captain was a Soccer Seven All-Star as well as St. Joseph's MVP last year. Sophomore Shawn Flynn is one of two runner-ups in goals, with three goals and one assist. Sophomore Tim Comey also has three goals with four assists for this season.

"Offensively, we're still waiting for them to come along," Gettler said. He said the lineup for the Minutemen will remain the same. "The players are playing well — we just haven't been lucky. It would be nice to have two wins in a week."

Minutewomen try to break slump

By DAN SARAZEN
Collegian Staff

For the players on the University of Massachusetts volleyball team this has been a trying season, and most of the things the Minutewomen have tried have not worked. Their record stands at 1-11 and they have a very difficult weekend as they travel to Rutgers University, Temple University and Drexel University.

UMass is coming off of a three games to none loss at the hands of Holy Cross last Tuesday. The good news about that match was the play of Nancy Sullivan, who has been the MVP so far this season. Along with Sullivan, Julieta Santiago and Sharon Panoff also played well. Panoff had 10 kills and seems to be creating a long and productive future for herself on the volleyball team.

The Minutewomen are in New Jersey tonight to play Rutgers (9-11). The Lady Knights are coming off winning the Yale Invitational, beating H.C. and Yale. Their leading hitter is Cari Cleveland. In her last three games Cleveland is hitting .386, and she was named player of the week for her efforts. Also in on the attack is freshman M.E. DiPasquale, who shared freshman of the week honors last week, hitting .492.

The Minutewomen play both Temple (12-7) and Drexel (7-9) on Saturday. UMass will play Temple at noon and then get in the bus to travel across Philadelphia in order to get to Drexel by 5 p.m. "When we set up the schedule we try to play as many good teams as possible", explained coach Carol Ford.

Despite their record, coach Ford is doing a good job of keeping the season in the best possible perspective. "It's all going to pay off," she said when talking about the difficult season and of the baptismal by fire that many of her freshman have had to endure.

Faced with few options Ford admits, "I have to keep them [the freshmen] out there. But the team will be strong down the road. I have faith in the future."

So it seems that the future of the volleyball team is not now, but with a little time and a little patience maybe it will be sooner than it appears.

Sports notices

This Sunday at Totman field, the University of Massachusetts softball team will play a 100-inning softball game in which they hope to raise $2,000 to help pay for their second annual trip to California.

Each player will try to raise at least $100 by getting friends, relatives, and fellow students to make a pledge.

"The trip is our only avenue to gain access to nationally ranked teams," coach Elaine Sortino said.

Also this weekend, don't forget the first-ever Midnight Madness, to be held tomorrow night starting at 10:30 at the Cage.

Cash prizes, dinner prizes and airline tickets can be won. The UMass basketball team will take part in a dunking contest and will scrimmage for its first practice of the year.

Students will be admitted free, but are asked to bring a non-perishable food item as a donation.

Duffey urges students to fight cuts in Boston

By NATHAN KRYSTALL
Collegian Staff

Chancellor Duffey is urging the University of Massachusetts community to devote Wednesday to the statewide protest against continued budget cuts to public higher education by attending a rally and lobbying effort at the Statehouse.

Duffey issued a statement Friday advocating that community members attend the rally or, if this is not possible, write letters to elected officials, newspaper editors, parents and others, advocating public higher education.

"I strongly urge faculty, staff and students to observe Wednesday, October 18th as a day of protest and advocacy in behalf of higher education," Duffey said in a letter to the University community.

"I ask all faculty members to be particularly understanding of the desire of some of their students to join in this day of protest," Duffey said.

Buses to transport protesters will leave for Boston Wednesday at 8:30 a.m. from the Haigis Mall.

Student Trustee Eric Nakajima said the buses are scheduled to arrive in Boston at 10.30 a.m., where protesters will be met by Rep. Stan Rosenberg, D-Amherst.

After a press conference on the effects of budget cutbacks for UMass, a noon rally will be held outside the Statehouse on the Boston Common. Lisa Nelson, a representative to the Leadership Coalition, said 10,000 protesters are expected at the rally.

Door-to-door lobbying of representatives and senators will follow until the buses depart for Amherst at 3:30 p.m.

All 29 campuses in the statewide university system will be represented, she said.

"We'd like to have 2,000 people from UMass," Nelson said.

Nakajima said he hopes the rally will influence legislators to reconsider a proposal for an additional five percent cutback to public higher education.

UMass will receive an additional cutback of some $8 million if the five percent plan goes into effect, according to a fact sheet distributed by the administration.

Last week, Nakajima said students face the possibility of a serious tuition increase if the University's budget continues to be slashed.

UMass professionals approve union

Landslide for Local 509 comes after 11 years

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

Professional staff at the University of Massachusetts voted overwhelmingly Thursday to unionize after an 11-year battle to join Local 509 of the Service Employees International Union.

Of the 1,200 professionals at the Amherst and Boston campuses and the Cooperative Extension, 969 turned out to vote on the issue.

Some 680 professionals voted to unionize, 200 opposed, and 83 supported forming an alternative union, the Professional Staff Organization.

"I'm wildly enthusiastic," said Simon Keochakian, associate director for Clinical Services at the Center for Counseling and Academic Development.

"I've been working on this for a long time and this is a high point," he said. "It's about time."

Keochakian said Local 509's excellent reputation in light of the state's fiscal uncertainty is the major factor which sparked the decision to unionize.

"They have a very successful organizing strategy," he said. "The fiscal situation in the state and the uncertainty about the state has made people real nervous. That combination made the difference this time."

Professional staff members have been attempting to organize since 1988, organizing three previous votes which failed by slim margins, he said.

The union's next step is to elect a contract negotiating team consisting of some 15 to 20 people to represent the groups within the union, which include all workers on the campuses who are not faculty.

"I'm sure lots of people will come forward to serve," he said.

One focus of the union is to bargain for recall rights, which would give laid off employees hiring priority when new positions arise.

Northeast fight was not racial

By COSMO MACERO JR.
Collegian Staff

Dr. Arthur Hilson, director of public safety, incorrectly said a fight in the Northeast Residential Area last week was racially motivated.

The incident, which occurred early Sunday morning Oct. 8, involved three non-students and two students. According to University of Massachusetts police, three White males pulled up behind the students' car on Thatcher Way.

Police said a fight erupted, and one student was thrown to the ground and repeatedly punched and kicked. The assaulted student was originally identified as African-American, and later, Hispanic.

Another incident occured about an hour earlier outside the lobby of John Quincy Adams Residence Hall in the Southwest Residential Area.

A Black freshman student was assaulted and called racial epithets by three White men when leaving the lobby with a pizza.

"Both incidents were definitely racially motivated," Hilson said last week.

However, on Friday, University officials said the student assaulted in the Thatcher Way incident was White, and did not believe the attack was racially motivated.

Hilson said yesterday, to his knowledge, the prepared report mentioned no race or ethnicity of the assault victim. Last week, however, he did state to three Collegian staff members that the student was Black.

Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis Madson asserted yesterday that the student was indeed a White male.

"The student identified himself to me Friday as a White male," Madson said. "There were also several reporters present," he said.

"He wanted to make clear that there wasn't any racial motivation behind the incident."

Deerfield adjusts to enrollment of 123 girls

DEERFIELD (AP) – They had to change some of the songs at Deerfield Academy this fall. It hardly seemed appropriate to sing about the "sons of Deerfield" after 123 girls were admitted to the prep school.

And the library sculpture, "The Deerfield Boys," is getting a sister statue in "The Deerfield Girls."

But students and administrators said those are just cosmetic changes that don't begin to tell the story of what it means to reverse 41 years of history as an all-male school.'

"When you see the girls on campus sometimes you double-take," said Ryan Scannell, a 15 year-old junior from Worcester. "But I'm used to it now."

Shortly after classes started this fall, reaction on campus was generally positive, with many students saying the adjustment was not difficult.

Administrators agreed.

"It's not as if our boys have been locked in a monastery for years," said Bob Hastings, assistant headmaster.

A few boys have refused to sing the new gender-neutral version of an old school song, steadfastly singing "The sons of Deerfield rally," as the first line, instead of "Deerfield! O Deerfield Rally."

One of the new arrivals said she understands those feelings.

"There's 40 some odd years of Deerfield that are just sort of locked up in that song," said Rachel Reingold, a 16-year-old sophomore from Greenwich, Conn.

Reingold said she got a much warmer welcome than she braced herself for.

"I expected to meet some seniors or even teachers that really resented us," she said.

Deerfield, a collection of elegant brick buildings clustered in the historic section of old Deerfield, was founded by Frank L. Boyden just after the turn of the century. It originally was a co-ed school, but in 1948, the school went all-boy after the number of female students dwindled to just a handful.

BOG finances upcoming comedy series

By PAUL MORRIS
Collegian Staff

The Board of Governors voted unanimously Thursday to allocate $7,000 for a six-show comedy series sponsored by the Governor's Program Council.

Lisa Balentine, the BOG treasurer, said the council requested $1,000 per show to attract quality comedians, $600 for advertising and $400 for a reusable BOG banner.

Comedian Richard Jeni, who recently appeared on the "Tonight Show," will kick off the series Oct. 25 in the Campus Center Auditorium, according to Jeff Glassman, the program council coordinator. The other shows are scheduled for Oct. 31, Nov. 7, Nov. 28, Dec. 5 and Dec. 12 all at the Hatch.

In other business: Balentine said the Graduate Student Senate wants to cut by 50 percent their $11,000 administration fee to the BOG budget for the 1989-90 school year. They also want to put their $7,360 programming fee in an ad hoc account, she said.

"They are in the process of reorganizing their budget internally, by shifting sources around to what meets graduate students needs today,"Balentine said.

She said the Graduate Senate leaders do not think graduate students use the BOG office staff enough to warrant an $11,000 fee. The administration fees pay personnel and buy office supplies for the BOG offices, she said. Eight out of the 32 seats are reserved for graduate students, but this year the GSS has yet to appoint representatives to the board.

She said the senators do not want to spend programming dollars on events graduate students are not likely to attend. If the GSS funds are placed in an ad hoc account, program coordinators would have to petition the Graduate Senate for funds, she said.

"I disagree with the way they are handling this," Balentine said. "They have no right not to pay what their floor approved in March."

Balentine said the GSS approved the 1990 budget and instead should be negotiating for the 1991 budget.

"Ideally they want to shift their funds to a center for graduate students, much like the Student Union for undergraduates,"she said.

Balentine will speak to the senators about the budget issue at the GSS meeting Oct. 24.

Also, Governor Bill Hewitt recommended that the board take action to rescind the three-year ban on Coors beer at the Hatch and the Top of the Campus lounges.

"Students should have freedom of choice,"Hewitt said. "The AFL-CIO boycott has been lifted and I don't see any reason to continue the ban on Coors."

The motion will be debated and voted on Oct. 19.

Bruce Ledoux, the Campus Center vending coordinator, asked the governors to find out why the University Store is allowed to sell credit cards when student vendors are prohibited.

"I can't figure out why there is an incredible double standard,"he said. "Either everybody sells everything or nobody sells anything."

Glassman said he recently met with Bill Ellmore, manager of the Bluewall, and they hope to open an "under 21" club in the Bluewall by Nov. 3. Ellmore helped create Murray D's, the dance club in the Campus Center.

Body wrap does fight flab

Reporter tests effectiveness of body wraps

By DAVID R. MARK
Collegian Staff

Complaints that claims made in an advertisement were false and deceptive were proven unfounded after an investigation by the Collegian.

Styles For Deborah, 65 University Drive, Amherst, made claims in their advertisement — most recently in the Collegian Oct. 10 — that a $40, one-hour body wrap could help a person "lose 4 inches to 14 inches in one hour," thus allowing the person to lose "unsightly cellulite" and restore "elasticity to loose flabby skin."

A Collegian staff member went to the salon Friday afternoon to undergo a body wrap, with the goal of determining if claims in the advertisement were false or deceptive.

"If you understand the whole concept [you know the advertisement is not false]," said Judy Roncalli, a licensed aestitician in charge of the body wraps. "You can't lose seven inches and assume it's gone forever."

Roncalli said to be a licensed aesthetician, a person must be knowledgeable in how to care for skin.

The body wrap, she said, is only part of a program. In order to maintain an inch loss, a person must eat well and exercise.

The body wrap process is three-part:

- The use of a brush to exfoliate dead skin.
- A cream — Cell-u-rid by the Beneficial Company, Midvale, Utah — is then spread over the body parts that had been brushed. "The exfoliation allows the cream to penetrate the skin," Roncalli said.
- The portion of the body is then wrapped in cellophane. "The cream sinks into the skin, increasing circulation to the body," Roncalli said. The increased circulation leads to the inch loss, she said.

After one hour, the portion of the body is then remeasured. There are 11 areas that can be measured, including sections of the torso, the arms and the legs. In the Collegian investigation, only three areas — all on the torso — were measured.

Antartica inspires student in design contest

By LISA MILLEGAN
Collegian Correspondent

Imagine strolling down Newbury Street in Boston. The street is filled with chic, upscale stores enticing you to enter them but one in particular catches your eye: "Antarctica."

It is a men's clothing boutique that uses a penguin as a logo. Entering the store, you are greeted by a killer whale breaking through ice. Clothes are displayed on icebergs. The blue ceiling and the use of lighting and mirrors help create the "Antarctic" image of the store.

"Antartica" isn't a real store but its creator may actually be designing stores in Boston in the near future.

Rafael Weil, a UMass senior, won first place and $500 for the "Antartica" plan in a design contest last spring, which was sponsored by Boston's Institute of Store Planners.

The contest was open to all college design students in the New England area. Weil, a 20-year-old native of Venezuela, said his instructor Peggy Gulick required all her Design IV students to enter the contest.

Christine Girone and Christine Lesieur, both UMass students, were second and third place winners respectively.

The students were assigned to create an imaginary men's clothing store on Newbury Street. Also, they were asked to design a storefront, store graphics and 2,000 square feet of interior space complete with fixtures and materials.

Students designed a store for an architect who lives in downtown Boston, and originally from Newburyport, Mass. He drives a '67 Mustang in mint condition and enjoys biking, reading mysteries and listening to jazz and classical music. The client also likes animals and dislikes anything pretentious. His favorite TV shows are"Night Court" and "60 Minutes".

Weil said his idea for the store came from the likes animals part of the client profile.

"I like animals too and I chose the penguin because I thought it was a good symbol to represent men's clothing," he said."I designed the store with glass block and special lighting so that it would really have that icy look. The floor was designed so that it would be like you were walking on water."

"We sent the plans for our stores in by mail so we had to make sure that they were perfectly clear. We couldn't be there to explain them to the judges," he said.

In fact, Weil didn't make the class deadline for turning in the project. He chose instead to perfect it for the contest, sacrificing a possible A in the class.

Weil was invited to participate in Boston Design Week, which consists of over 100 showrooms featuring the latest designs. Thousands of architects, interior designers and store planners attend the convention.

Weil said the convention gave him a lot of exposure.

"People kept coming over to me, giving me their business cards, telling me my work was great."

Weil was also selected to present his portfolio at the Art Director's Club.

Weil did not graduate on time last year because of the time commitment that came with the contests.

"It was kind of bad when I met prospective employers last spring and I had to tell them that they had have to wait one more semester before I'm graduated."

Weil said he plans to graduate this semester and pursue a career as a graphic designer in New York or Boston.

Nakajima said he expects the rally to have a major impact on state legislators by reinforcing public awareness on the plight of higher education.

"It's already being talked about," he said. "Every student to go will have an impact."

Nakajima said protesters who voice concerns directly to their area representatives and senators will have the most impact on deterring further cutbacks.

"If we can get 10 to 15 people from each town to talk with senators and representatives, that will make the biggest difference," he said. "It'll let them know that their constituents are being hurt and are being activated."

Nakajima said student coordinators for the lobbying effort are needed. The coordinators will brief students on budget issues and guide them to their respective representatives and senators.

There will be a meeting Tuesday at 7 p.m. in the Cape Cod Lounge for students interested in acting as coordinators.

Roncalli measured a loss of 1.6 inches among the three areas. Assuming figures are consistent for all areas, the loss would be about 6 inches, agreeing with claims in the advertisement.

Deborah Ernest, owner of the salon, said more than 100 people have tried the body wrap in the past year, and all have lost at least four inches.

Both Ernest and Roncalli said the advertisement was not deceptive, but that people were reading into the claim.

"When we first started doing this, I was skeptical," Ernest said. "People are assuming [the inch loss occurred in one body part] because that's what they want to believe. When someone makes an appointment, we explain the entire process so there are no misunderstandings."

Mass Millions officials estimate $40 mil payoff after no winners

BRAINTREE, Mass (AP) — "It is going to be a monstrous week," says James Hosker, state lottery executive secretary, as his organization braces for a flood of wagering for the highest payoff in Massachusetts history.

The Mass Millions lottery game, chosen on Fridays, has not had a six-number winner for 13 weeks and the jackpot has swollen to $28 million. Lottery officials say it may soar to $40 million by next Friday.

Hosker said he was stunned that nobody won last Friday because nearly 11 million tickets were sold during the week. Hosker noted that about 60 percent of them were "quik-pic" tickets, with numbers chosen by the computer.

Hosker said some bettors were still waiting in line to buy tickets Friday night when they were shut out because the Massachusetts Lottery Commission computer was closed for the drawing at 7:55 p.m.

An estimated 200,000 tickets were sold every 15 seconds at one point Friday, more than 220 per second. The commission has about 5,600 sales outlets in the state.

The Mass Millions payoff will be the largest in state history. The biggest prize so far has been an $18 million jackpot in the Megabucks lottery, won on March 10, 1984.

Massachusetts lottery officials predicted mania this week. "People will be flying in from around the country to buy tickets," said Hosker.

In the Mass Millions lottery, bettors wager $1 on six numbers between 1 and 46. The odds against winning are more than nine million to one.

The money raised by state lottery sales goes to Massachusetts cities and towns for municipal purposes.

WMass residents contribute time, sweat to the homeless

NORTH ADAMS (AP) — Sleeping bags, doughnuts and hot soup bolstered residents of this western Massachusetts town who bedded down overnight on rainy streets Saturday to raise money for the homeless.

And in nearby Adams, business executives shed their jackets and ties to renovate a rest home being converted to a shelter, as area residents devoted part of their weekend to the homelessness problem.

About 60 people set up sleeping bags on Main Street in North Adams as part of the Sleep-a-thon, which lasted from 8 p.m. to 5 a.m. Sunday in a 50-degree rain. Each participant brought in contribution pledges that matched the hours they spent outdoors Saturday night.

The second annual such event in North Adams, the Sleep-a-thon this year netted more than $11,000 for the homeless, said Ann Gibbons, an organizer. Last year's effort, which featured only 13 people, brought in $5,500.

Proceeds from the Sleep-a-thon will benefit the Northern Berkshire Community Action Crisis Fund, which aids the homeless with emergency needs.

"If you just got booted out by your landlord, they'll house you in a motel, or if your car broke and it's your last resort," said Gibbons, who by day is the managing editor for The Transcript of North Adams.

Sparsely populated and nestled in mountains and forest, the Berkshires communities are not usually equated with homeless people. But organizers of the weekend fund-raisers said the area has its homeless, too.

In nearby Adams, on Saturday about 135 current and former executives of General Electric Co. shingled, caulked, sanded and painted a house set to become a shelter for homeless people.

Russian Elvis fan gains visa to visit Graceland

BOSTON (AP) — Kolya Vasin, the first person ever granted a Soviet exit visa for the express purpose of visiting Graceland, the home of his hero, Elvis Presley, arrived here Sunday on his way to Memphis.

Wearing bright blue suede shoes he had just purchased in London, Vasin, 44, an artist, sculptor and rock impresario in Leningrad, arrived at Logan International Airport with 79 other Elvis fans from Great Britain. It was his first trip outside the Soviet Union.

Vasin, who first heard a contraband copy of "Jailhouse Rock" in 1958 in the Soviet Union, said he has been a devoted Elvis fan since then. Visiting Graceland, he said, will be the culmination of a 30-year dream.

"I listen to 'Jailhouse Rock' for the first time in 1958," said the long-haired, bearded Vasin, who wore blue jeans, a black Elvis T-shirt, a yellow scarf and a black jacket. "After this shocking moment, I love Elvis forever."

Vasin's obsession with Elvis is simple, he said.

"Because his voice, his spirit is God to me," he said. "All the good feelings of the human race come out of Elvis."

He pointed to his shoes and said, "I got the shoes in London. This is my dream on my feet. All my life I hear 'Blue Suede Shoes' and I dream about them."

"All I want is to love rock and roll," said Vasin, who carried with him a charcoal drawing he did of Elvis. "I sit in my very small room and listen to rock and roll with my friends and drink vodka."

"All my life I listen to music in English and speak in Russian," said Vasin.

Vasin said he bought all his Elvis records on the black market. The first Elvis record was sold legally this year, he said.

Vasin, who left Moscow Oct. 7, said he had tried to get an exit visa for a year with no luck. But when he was approached by Elvisly Yours, his luck changed. The British club arranged for an American Elvis club, Suspicious Minds, to extend a formal invitation to Vasin through Soviet authorities. As a result, he was finally granted a visa. Vasin said Soviet authorities told him the visa was the first specifically for a visit to Graceland.

During his 10-day visit to Tennessee, Vasin plans to visit Sun Records, Elvis' first recording label in Memphis, and Elvis' birthplace in Tupelo, Miss.

On his Boston airport layover, Vasin broke into a quick rendition of Chuck Berry's tune "Memphis," singing, "Long distance information, get me Memphis, Tennessee . . ." and drank a beer.

Lifestyles of the poor and unknown

As soon as Rich Tettemer, sports director for TV22, announced that the first person from the crowd who made a half-court shot would get $120, the stands at Curry Hicks Cage began to tremble. The stampede of students all rushing down onto the court to push and shove their way to the front of the pack was amazing.

But money is money, especially if you do not have to work for it.

Gayle Long

Fortunately, this portion of "Midnight Madness", the formal opening celebration of UMass basketball, was cut short so the fans could see the team. I personally was glad to see that none of the fortune-seekers put up a stink and stayed out on the court. They all returned to their seats, with the promise that the half-court contest would resume later.

If these people were climbing all over each other for $120, imagine what they would do for $40,000,000? Crazy, insane stunts? Leap tall buildings in a single bound? No. Just pay $1, and probably a hellish wait in line at some variety or drugstore in Amherst, and they will get a chance for Mass Millions $40 million dollar jackpot.

A nice, orderly get-rich-quick attempt. Maybe not as easy as Publisher's Clearinghouse, but for the money it is worth it.

Imagine the things that could be done with $40 million. Well, actually, $30 million after taxes. It would be phenomenal. I could probably wipe out a huge chunk of the budget crisis in Western Massachusetts, fund the UMass libraries until the state straightens out its act out or maybe even buy the university. I am sure Dukakis would love to sell it, because he certainly does not seem to care about it.

Maybe I will send some money to President Bush and Drug Czar Bennett for their latest on drugs. A real sound investment, but I will have to think about it.

There are just so many possible ways to spend money. Giving it away to charities is emotionally rewarding, but when did anyone win big in the lottery and give it all away to an organization that betters humanity? Nobody gives it all away. That would not be American. Philanthropy is one thing, stupidity is another. What is better: to give it all away and feel that humanity has been bettered by it, or to materially better yourself and give only a small portion away?

I know that I would keep it, and donate some of it to charity. I would buy a huge estate on Martha's Vineyard, my own boat to travel back and forth, an indoor pool, an expensive car, my own newspaper (cough, cough). . .here I go dreaming again. Who would pass up a life of luxury? Robin Leech would visit my humble abode and proclaim to the millions of home viewers that this is the place to be. Hip, hot and happening. Yeah.

Ahhh, wealth. It is everyone's dream.

We would all love to be so wealthy that we could take care of all our families and friends, help out people in need, and still have enough left over to live life to the fullest.

I know that I will be one of the millions buying a ticket in hopes of fortune. I will choose my numbers and wait patiently in a line to pay for it.

And as I wait I will dream, of money and wealth and fantastic homes and cars.

I know that the chances are so miniscule, but I will take the chance. I have as much chance for the $40 million as the fans at the Cage Saturday night had to win the $120 with one shot. But they still tried, and did not lose anything while trying. All I will lose is a dollar or two, and if no one wins it then it will be even be greater next week. That will give me that much longer to dream what to do with it until I do win.

$40 Million dollars is too much money. But I would sure like to have it. Then again, if I do win, I hope that nobody else does. $20 Million is not as much fun, and I could probably find something to do with that. Easy.

Anxious for Mondays

We eagerly wish to congratulate Gayle Long on her ever-so informative column which blessedly appears every Monday in your fine paper. I must say that it brightens our Mondays and not intending to exaggerate, it brightens our whole week.

Unfortunately, we have only been able to enjoy her last two articles, on the skateboarder problem and telecommunications workers. These are trivial and many solutions can be easily agreed upon.

Skateboarders roam the campus like the Plague, inflicting scars for life on us honest and innocent tuition payers. Not that we don't accept diversity, but they all are immoral, demonic "rolling refuse." We hail your though-provoking insightfulness, second only to the word of God.

Our pathetic minds cannot predict what will be next. We'll just have to wait for your next comprehensive, unbiased, open-minded, truthful article. Thank God for Mondays.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted.

Where to cut the budget

First of three editorials on the budget cuts

University of Massachusetts students, faculty and staff rightly criticize Gov. Dukakis' decisions to continuously cut funds — $23.5 million in 27 months — from our school. What is not discussed is where he should cut to end the state's deficit.

That question, no doubt, has gone through the mind of our beloved governor. With students planning to rally Wednesday at the Statehouse, we have some suggestions for "wheres."

Instead of cutting more from UMass, Gov. Dukakis, we suggest you trim from the following:

State-funded construction projects: The only ones to be funded should be buildings in such disrepair that people are endangered.

Bridges and roads: We'll survive a year's freeze on bridge and road repair, except for those that endanger drivers.

Expense accounts: Think of the money that could be saved if expense accounts — for travel, meals, long distance phone calls and mailings — were cut in half. That means your expense account, too.

When students go to the Statehouse this Wednesday, and we hope thousands do, they should propose "wheres" instead of just give criticism. The media will be more responsive, and maybe, just maybe, the governor will be more responsive too.

Unsigned editorials reflect the majority opinion of the Collegian board of editors

When two surreal events occur within minutes of each other, you know they're related. Don't be fooled by the separate coverage each gets — news writers have to do it this way.

Alise Harfield

But columnists don't. We'll give you the truth. Being creative writers, we select stories that news hounds simply relate facts about, and connect them so they make more sense.

The only fact I'll bog you down with is that the two incidents to which I refer happened outside the continental U.S.

They are, respectively, the excavation of Shakespeare's Globe Theater nearby the "Thames" (intelligently pronounced "Temms" — I told you we columnists were nicer — you wouldn't find grammar hints in a news piece, would you?) and the Soviet News Agency's report of the finding of several ten-foot tall, small headed, three-eyed beings in Russia.

Now, you don't have to be as imaginative as I to appreciate the implicit connection here.

But just in case you're not, I'll spell it out for you. If you were a thespian ghost under rubble since Elizabethan times in England you'd come back to the largest land mass you could find to haunt too.

They're ba-ack! . . .Right in time for Halloween. If I know ghosts, they're probably pretty mad about having been suffocated for X centuries. Why, as an active-imaginated English major, I hear them now . . .

SPECTRAL ROMEO (just under the surface of an old Victorian mansion): Art thou suffocated undereth all this wood, my Juliet?

PHANTASMAL JULIET (hyperventalating): O, woe, woe, woe is me.

SPECTRAL ROMEO (excited with plan): Would thou considereth following myself anon, to another more airy place, O dearest one?

PHANTASMAL JULIET: As long as it's not back home . . . myself and thyself were never quite accepted there . . . oh, how quickly we forget, when first we practice to kill Romeo and Juliet!

SPECTRAL ROMEO: Then away we shall go! Off to another hideaway for the next era! O, but we musteth not be seen by anyone. We must disguise ourselves . . .

PHANTASMAL, FURIOUS JULIET: Again? I am weary of this lifestyle!

SPECTRAL, ACCOMODATING ROMEO: Don't feareth, my princess. We'll go where a balcony awaits us.

PHANTASMAL, FLUSTERED JULIET: In that caseth, I will follow thee. I could use some fresh airs with which to breathe again!

SPECTRAL ROMEO: We will disguise ourselves with yet another eye with which to find our way. No one will tell who are really thou, thee and me!

PHANTASMAL JULIET BECOMES A BIT AGITATED.

. . . Then we will dippeth in the riverbanks, and shrink our heads! Take leftover steroids from the disfunctional drainage pipes by the river to grow ten feet talleth! Yes, yes!

NOW TANGIBLE JULIET: Let us waste no more time. It's off into the atmosphere to glide like birds to a free countryside! and then scare the lovely living lights of day out of its inhabitants!

MATERIAL ROMEO: By the by, Juliet — where is this free land?

Make your voice heard

A Letter to the University Community
From Chancellor Duffey:

I strongly urge faculty, staff and students to observe Wednesday, October 18th as a day of protest and advocacy on behalf of public higher education.

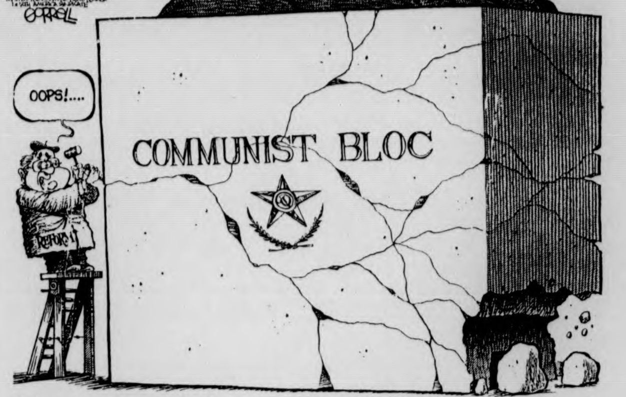
For some, this will mean joining the bus caravan to Beacon Hill. (Buses leave from Haigis Mall and other designated campus locations at 8:30 a.m. on Wednesday morning, returning in the afternoon.)

For others, this may mean devoting parts of the day to writing letters to elected officials, to newspaper editors, parents and others about the need to maintain strong, quality public higher education in Massachusetts.

I ask all faculty members to be particularly understanding of the desire of some of their students to join in this day of protest. This could mean rescheduling or forgoing classes in some cases. But decisions in this regard will be solely at the discretion of faculty members. I hope that some faculty members will consider joining their students in Boston on the 18th.

In whatever way you choose to express yourself, make your voice heard. It is important that you do so.

Joseph Duffey
UMass Chancellor



Reach out . . . for your wallet

Mounds of fattening potato salad are on your right. A bowl of greasy chips and other junk food is to your left. What do you do?

Wait for the "Waistline" tone and then take three deep breaths. One. Two. Three. Okay, now say to yourself "I will not break my diet this weekend" and reach straight up the middle for the dish of broccoli and carrots.

Bob Bobala

Very good. You've passed your first test and are on your way to a slimmer, trimmer you. The only thing is, you're not at a barbecue. You're on the phone, listening to a recording on the "Waistline," a 1-900 number designed to help you lose weight by spending all of your cash on phone calls so you have no money left to buy food. A diet tip is revealed every day, so you have to keep calling. And at $1.50 for the first minute and $.75 each additional minute, there goes the money you were going to spend on that late night pizza. So the "Waistline" really works.

It's all part of this 1-900 number craze that capitalizes on America's boredom, loneliness, and general desire to push the buttons on a touch-tone phone. There isn't just the smut lines and the "chat" lines that kids call to build up their parents phone bills. There's laugh lines, prayer lines, and problem lines. All recordings that you can listen to for as long as you want.

Take, for example, the "Women's Secret Confessions' line.

All you have to do is dial 1-900-909-1133 to hear recordings of women confessing things "they won't even tell their closest friends." Now, maybe I shouldn't knock this line. There may be a certain therapeutic value here for women (I don't mean to be sexist. I just haven't found a "Men's Secret Confessions" line yet.) who share their problems with others by way of recorded phone message. But for the money they spend on this line, they could get real counseling.

The ones I hate the most, though, are the celebrity lines, especially all those MTV stars. Although, maybe I should call Menudo and Paula Abdul to hear what they have to say before I judge them.

My personal favorite, however, the one I really can't stand, is the Jose Canseco hotline (For non-baseball fans, Jose is a superstar for the American League champion Oakland A's). I got through to Jose the other day (1-900-234-JOSE) and he told me all about his personal life. Here, I'll fill you in on it so you don't have to spend the $2.00 for the first minute and $1.00 for each additional minute.

First his wife came on the phone and told me how Jose was fooling around that morning, trying to put their dog in the refrigerator. Nice guy, huh? Jose finally took the phone away from his wife because, after all, he wanted to talk to me personally. I'm that important. He predicted the A's will win the World Series in six games. Although, his wife shouted in the background that they'd win it in four. Who knows, maybe she knows something he doesn't.

Then Jose told me his whole family is coming to town. They're all going to hang around his house and play dominos and blackjack. They don't gamble with real money though, of course. However, they do like to go to the mall and spend real money. And Jose just bought his brother an early Christmas present: a Porsche 930, just like the one he's got.

Finally, Jose had a few words for the kids: "Say no to drugs. Listen to your parents," that is, "if they make sense," and most importantly, "call back!" He'll have something different to tell them tomorrow, same number, same price. "This is Jose Canseco. Thank you for calling my hotline."

Well, thank you Jose. After listening to you, I've become very inspired. I think I may even start up my own 1-900 number and you and anyone else will be able to call me to find out what's happening in my personal life. I'll tell you what my plans are for next weekend, what I'm going to go after graduation, and maybe, if you're lucky, I'll even tell you what it cost me (in pay-to-listen phone services) to write this column. Kids, get your parents' permission before you call.

No place for violence and hatred

I am deeply concerned about several incidents of violence and harassment which occurred in our community during the past week. I am committed to seeing that this campus does everything it can to support the victims, ensuring strong and appropriate punishment. I am proud of the stand for civility and diversity that this campus has taken and the numerous efforts to become a truly multicultural community.

In two separate incidents, students were physically assaulted. In one instance, an African-American student was injured in a fight during which he states that a racial epithet was used. In the second incident, a student was injured in a fight after his car was stopped by individuals who were angry about his failure to use a turn signal. (The student was mistakenly reported to be a Latino man, but identified himself as Caucasian.)

In both cases, the victims and witnesses have identified suspects, who are not University students, and criminal charges are being pursued in court. We have issued trespass orders which prohibit them from returning to the campus. If they do return, they are subject to arrest. Staff throughout Student Affairs are working to provide follow-up support to the victims. A third incident involves anti-Semitic and homophobic graffiti in a residence hall. There is an on-going investigation, but there are currently no suspects.

Violence and harassment will not be tolerated on this campus. I encourage every member of the community to report anything they know about these and similar incidents to an R.A. or an R.D., the Dean of Students, or Public Safety, and to provide support for the victims of prejudice, harassment and violence.
